Tori's rock 'n roll spectacle

Tori Amos shedding her piano-diva status to tour with a backing band (guitar, bass and drums) for the first time.

TORI AMOS
Avalon Ballroom
April 25

BOSTON — Tori Amos is clearly a performer whose star is on the rise. Saturday's show in Boston, the fifth stop on her Sneak Preview '98 Tour, sold out instantly. There is a considerable buzz surrounding her upcoming From the Choirgirl Hotel — an album, which, if her Avalon performance was any indication, promises to be more of a rock 'n roll affair than her earlier piano-based work.

Much of the inspiration for the new songs was drawn from two major changes in Amos's life — an unfortunate miscarriage and her recent wedding to sound engineer Mark Hawley. She's even touring with a backing band (guitar, bass and drums) for the first time. The more things change in her life, the more things don't stay the same — at least in concert.

Gone was the palpable intensity of earlier tours where Amos stunned her audiences silent with an alarming intensity. The lighting, once simple and nondescript, was overdone in a bevy of flashing strobe lights and mirror balls. This was not the Tori of old. This was a rock 'n roll show, pure and simple. It is clear she has aspirations of being a rock goddess, but one must ponder, "Is this a good thing?" My guess is no.

The problem with the new material in a live setting was evident from the beginning. From the opening notes of "Spark," the album's first single, Amos and her three-piece backing band went for the jugular. While there's nothing wrong with such an in-your-face approach, Amos has made her mark by relying on the sheer power of the intensely personal messages she conveys in her work. Saturday night, Amos took a markedly different approach, letting the harsh lighting and sonic overkill (complete with guitarist Steve Caton's solos) of her band steer the course.

While the sonic pyrotechnics of her bandmates too often drowned out her effusive and virtuosic piano playing, Amos's voice still managed to rise above the mix. Equal parts Kate Bush and P.J. Harvey, Amos has the rare gift of being able to express emotion without even really trying.

While much of the songs on her set list were songs off the new album, Amos did balance things off with older favorites such as "Horses," "God" and "Precious Things." Especially impressive was a radically re-worked "Baker Baker" and "The Donut Song," which were performed solo.

Still, the majority of songs off From the Choirgirl Hotel were bludgeoned, save for the quiet beauty of "Jackie's Strength." Written as she was preparing to take the plunge into married life, Amos used the understated elegance of Jackie Kennedy as a poignant metaphor to quell her insecurities about being a wife, belting out "I got lost on my wedding day." The band framed the song well, showing restraint and letting Amos take the lead.

Amos plans on returning to Boston this summer, most likely playing a much larger venue. She would be wise to re-consider the modus operandi of her live show.

Show raises awareness of racism

SKA AGAINST RACISM TOUR
The Palladium
April 24

WORCESTER — Covered in sweat. That's what I was when I left the Palladium in Worcester Friday night after attending Ska Against Racism.

The show was a mix of ska and ska-punk bands on a national tour to try and put a stop to racism. The tour is being sponsored by Asian Man Records and Moon Ska NYC Records, in part with the Museum of Tolerance, Artists for a Hatefree America, and Anti- Racist Action. The tour is making stops all over the country to try and raise awareness of the racism that still exists in our country.

Arriving in the middle of Kemuri's set, a smile crept over my face as I saw the crowd. Punks, rudeboys, skins, music-lovers alike were all skanking, pogoing and dancing throughout the venue. The show was a near sellout with close to 2,000 in attendance.

Kemuri is a Japanese ska-punk band on a rare tour of the United States. They had a full horn line who were extremely tight, which tends to be hard when playing as fast as these guys were. If possible, Kemuri seemed like they may be having more fun than the crowd. No one in the band was stationary. All seven band members were going absolutely nuts on stage with the look of excitement on their faces. They won over many new fans, and there will definitely be a desire for them to come back to the States.

Next up were MU330 and Mustard Plug, both playing forms of ska-punk, with hints of traditional ska and metal being thrown in now and then. The first song by MU330 entitled "Stuff," a song which has made many different ska compilations got the crowd immediately into the action. Kids stormed in from the lobby and from their seats to join the ruckus in the front. For both of these bands skanking seemed to be out of style, and moshing and crowd surfing appeared to be the thing to do.

MU330 made sure the crowd noticed their horn line, as they featured all different races and the unity that they shared. Unfortunately for MU330, they got shafted in their time slot and played a very short set.

Not to fear though because on Mustard Plug's first note they had whipped the crowd back up into a frenzy. They came out with a really professional look to themselves, with matching gray suits and yellow shirts. "Mr. Smiley," an older song, got the crowd singing along at the top of their lungs. The lead singer decided to stage dive, and that drew a great response. Everybody was cheering for him as he climbed back on stage.

Next up were the Toasters, the pioneers of third wave ska. These guys have been doing it forever, and have helped out new bands time and time again. Unlike most of the other bands on the bill, they are not a ska-punk band. They play straight in your face ska, influenced heavily by the two tone movement by such bands as the Specials and Madness.

Bucket, the guitar player for the Toasters and also the head of Moon Records, talked to the crowd before their set started about how many people in front of him there were who wanted to stomp out racism, and how we can get the word out through music. The Sledge, on trumpet, also had some words of wisdom for the crowd. He told everyone to take a break from the stage diving, the moshing, the crowd surfing.

"We represent the old school," said The Sledge. He wanted the crowd to skank along to the music, not throw each other around and to the ground. Well, he got his wish. Everybody, and I really mean everybody, was skanking along to the music. I'm grateful The Sledge commented to the crowd because there are those out there that think every band should have mosh pits, whether the music is hard or not.

The Toasters proved that they are still one of the best ska bands when they broke into their second song, "Two Tone Army." Everyone in the venue, whether young or old, male or female was singing along with the Toasters. The next song was "Shocker," which is off one of their earlier albums Skaboom. They did a great job of mixing old songs with their newer ones. Next up was "Don't Let the Bastards Grind You Down," a song which was in MTV's rotation a few months back. This song was accompanied by many fans dancing along with the Toasters on stage, which the Toasters fully supported. I give the Toasters an enormous amount of credit because they have proved to me that they will never sell-out. A great example was when during their set a girl passed out due to dehydration. The Toasters stopped the set, and the Sledge and their lead singer were on the floor caring for the girl, making sure the EMTs got to her as soon as possible.

Last but not least was Less Than Jake. They had been in the area recently playing the Middle East in Cambridge in February, and selling it out so a bigger venue like the Palladium was great for the fans. An eighties-looking metalhead first came on stage and played a guitar solo of straight metal for almost five minutes before Less Than Jake made their way on stage sending the crowd into pandemonium. The metalhead stayed on stage for the set dancing around, but he was not alone because their was a fully dressed clown also dancing around on stage. Less Than Jake brought an insane amount of crazed fun along with their music, posters, records, pez, and anything else they could find for the crowd. Every few minutes the crowd would either be

Big Punisher has awareness of place in life

BIG PUNISHER
Capital Punishment
Loud\RCA

When the Notorious B.I.G. dropped his groundbreaking Ready To Die, he set a standard in hip-hop that would never be reached again. Big Punisher is not Biggie, but he comes as close as you can possibly get. One could accurately depict Biggie as the Latin Big Poppa.

Like Biggie, Big Punisher gives you the violence and the sex but from the perspective that only a true ghetto warrior can portray. In other words, he adds enough humor and regret that it's realistic. Big Punisher knows that not everything he's done is right and he's not particularly proud of his actions, but they are his and now we all get to hear about them. That is what made Biggie so special, you respected him and maybe even feared him, but you also felt like you could walk up to him and have a conversation. Check "I'm Not A Player," I know everyone has already heard it, where Big Pun admits that he's fat and that girls mostly sleep with him because of his money, still boasting "I'm not a player I just f--k a lot." It's that ability to laugh at himself that makes him so real.

Adam Dlugacz

There's also a darker side to Big Pun, accurately depicted on the track "The Dream Shatterer," "I shatter dreams like Jordan, assault and batter your team." This is not a man to be trifled with. "You Ain't A Killer," has Big Pun spitting pure venom when he tells us that real killers don't get bogged down in East\West beef, they're strictly in it for the business. The song is ugly and gritty, and unlike most of his contemporaries does not make thug life sound attractive, just scary.

All the tracks are carried by Big Pun's staccato style, each word hitting you at such a rapid pace it resembles a machine gun. While the words are thought out, they come so quickly and continuously it feels like you are listening to a free style session. The intimacy of Big Pun's delivery invites the listener into another level, you know the man's thoughts, fears, and joys. It is the relationship with his listeners that has helped make him so famous in the underground circuit. It's also why people love Big Pun.

Like a true warrior, Big Pun has a lot of help on here showing that he gets love from the hip-hop scene as well as his fans. "Super Lyrical" features Black Thought from the Roots, Big Pun keeps up and the two of them flip it. Wyclef blesses "Caribbean Connection," Prospect is on "Capital Punishment," and Prodigy and Rebel INS kept it grimy and gritty on "Tres Leches (Triboro Trilogy)." All of those are major players who bring arsenals of lyrics and Pun can hold his head up high with each of them.

Noreaga appears on "You Came Up," and shows why everyone wants him on their album. The track has two of the most unique voices in the community and should be on just about every mix tape by the end of the month. Then there's the collaboration with Fat Joe who also produces this album. The only thing more terrifying then Pun and Joe together on a free buffet line, is the two of them ripping it on "Twinz." "I support Big Pun and anything he does, anything he loves\Two brothers from another mother sent from the above." Joey Crack then does a great production job backing up every one of those words. If Big Pun isn't scary enough you'll have nightmares for months over the thought of this collaboration.

Busta Rhymes is on the final track, "Parental Discretion," and offers some words of wisdom when he yells, as only Busta Bus can, "Parental discretion advised, cover your eyes\Little kids get out of here\Little girls too, this ain't for you, it's for the thugs." It's the intelligence of the song that shows that Big Pun is responsible to his community. He knows that he has lived a thug life and he knows it is not the example that he should be setting for children, so he's simply letting their parents know that they should not be listening to this. Maybe, if parents showed the responsibility and vested interest in their children that Big Pun does we'd be living in a safer community.

Like the Biggie Smalls, Big Pun has an awareness of his place in life and is not afraid to speak about it. Big Pun shares with us the pain of a man who was beaten as a child and lived in a ghetto his whole life. On the other hand he knows how to laugh, check "Uncensored" with Funk Master Flex, and he wants you to laugh with him even if it is to keep from crying. A

Stabbing Westward devoid of creativity

DARKEST DAYS
Stabbing Westward
Columbia

The latest LP from Stabbing Westward, Darkest Days, tries to inflict massive head trauma but winds up being more of a dull ache. Either way it is done with a blunt instrument.

Darkest Days, the follow up to 1996's Wither, Blister, Burn & Peel, which spawned the hit single "Shame," does not feature anything as catchy or fierce as "Shame." What it does feature is 16 songs of filler material that has a few interesting moments, but mostly consists of mediocre music and unimaginative lyrics.

Stabbing Westward, one of those generic angst-rock bands that seems to be a valuable commodity owned by Sony Music Entertainment Inc. directs their rage toward a specific source, yet somehow it feels contrived. It is impossible to name everyone that Stabbing Westward has ripped off on this album, but it does not take long to get sick of vocalist Christopher Hall's Trent Reznor impression.

The title track starts the disc off with such a bland sensation that it is unclear whether even the band themselves knew where they were going with it. Take it as a sign of things to come. Most of the song includes Hall screaming about his "rage and pain"— two emotions that have become cliche in modern rock. The rest of the album has absolutely no direction whatsoever. Stabbing Westward has a hard time finding out how they want their music to sound, fluctuating between alterna-rock, metal, techno, and industrial not perfecting any of the aforementioned genres. A band should perform well with one style of music before they start experimenting with anything else. What proves to be effective is the electronic/industrial flavored tune "Drugstore" and the aggressive "When I'm Dead," which is the closest thing to a hit single that Darkest Days has to offer.

The cover art is one of the most interesting aspects of the album — reminiscent of the Sandman comics probably because it was designed by Dave McKean.

Stabbing Westward needs to find some true energy and creativity. Because most of the time it takes to listen to Darkest Days is spent with two fingers pressed to the speakers, feeling for a pulse. C

David Bowie named to best dressed list

NEW YORK (AP) — Designer Todd Oldham accented his fall 1998 fashion collection with diamond jewelry by Fred Leighton. The value of the diamonds was estimated at $10 million, according to the Diamond Information Center.

Oldham used diamonds to accent his designs, which were previewed in an 11-minute film, Chandra's Daydream," and worn by models on stage before and after the screening. The event, which was held at Webster Hall, an East Village nightclub, introduced retailers and media to Oldham's fall collection.

Models sparkled in diamonds from their heads to their toes. "We were wearing diamond tiaras upside down and brooches in the hair," Oldham said. "Everything ended up being nontraditional, but it looked really young and fresh."

Designer Carolina Herrera and daughter Carolina Jr. were honored recently by a poll of 1,500 fashion journalists, designers and "other qualified observers." The poll is a consensus of written ballot and finalized by a committee that includes leading fashion editors.

The International Best-Dressed Poll has been conducted annually since 1940 by Eleanor Lambert, founder and coordinator. Herrera was among 12 women honored as the Best-Dressed Women of 1997-98. The list also includes designer Mary McFadden, actresses Nicole Kidman and China Chow, and Eliza Reed, vice-president of business development for Oscar de la Renta.

Herrera's daughter, a New York filmmaker, was one of four women named as 1997-98 members of the Best-Dressed Hall of Fame. Also appearing on this list is Vogue magazine editor Anna Wintour. The annual list of Best-Dressed Men of 1997-98 includes Matt Lauer, co-host of NBC's "Today" show; British musician-actor David Bowie; and Rupert Everett, who starred with Julia Roberts in My Best Friend's Wedding.

Broadway's Beauty and the Beast star Deborah Gibson ignored the old show-biz adage to never work with dogs or kids when she hit the fashion runway at the Motown Cafe to promote a fund-raising event.

It was the American Cancer Society's annual model and dog fashion show.

The humans included two young children and Jaime Rishar, seen in Dolce & Gabbana and Versace advertising campaigns. Among the dog models: Beau, a Yorkshire terrier; Lacey, a Maltese; Stella, a poodle; and Strawberri, a Scotch terrier. Gibson brought Rosie, a cocker spaniel, and Daisy, a miniature collie.

Human models wore flannel sleepwear, sweat suits and leather bomber jackets. The dogs wore doggie raincoats, collars and leashes, and T-shirts. All were designed by Big Dog Sportswear, one of the event's sponsors.

The Dogs Get Down at Motown fashion show was the annual pre-event leading to Dogs Walk'98 Against Cancer, to be held May 3. The dog walk-a-thon is a noncompetitive event, so Gibson laughingly urged supporters to "get your dogs off the treadmill now." The American Cancer Society says $400,000 was raised at last year's event in New York.

The first song they did, "My Very Own Flag," showed the fans who they were there to see. The entire dance floor opened up into a giant skank-pit. Everybody was singing along having the times of their lives. The crowd never ceased throughout the set. Less Than Jake played most of the crowd favorites such as "Just Like Frank," "Johnny Quest Thinks We're Sellouts," "Jen Doesn't Like Me Anymore," and "Liquor Store."

Midway through the set they began to play Polson's "Every Rose Has Its Thorn," while instantaneously everyone in the crowd who had a lighter pulled it out and waved it along to the music. Less Than Jake showed the crowd the true definition of ska-punk. Sorry all you big corporate industry ska-punk bands, but these guys are the real deal, and one of the few bands that actually deserve the title of a ska-punk band.

On the way out Anti-Racist Action had a table set-up so you wouldn't forget what the night was actually about. They were handing out many different pieces of literature, and had assorted buttons and patches for sale. And it looked like they were making a difference because the table was swamped with people after the show. Hopefully the music industry will continue in trying to knock racism off the planet.

Pandora feeds thirst for vampires

By Carol Deegan

VIOLIN
Anne Rice
Knopf Books

Anne Rice, the queen of gothic thrillers, is back doing what she does best: writing about vampires.

Two of her recent books, Violin and Servant of the Bones, strayed from this formula, with mixed results. In Servant, Rice was preoccupied with cults. Music, madness and Stefan, a fiddler ghost, filled the pages of Violin.

With Pandora (Knopf, $19.95), Rice gives readers the first in a promised new series of novels linked by the fledgling vampire David Talbot, who has set out to become a chronicler of his fellow Undead.

Pandora is a 2,000-year-old vampire, the first made by the great Marius. As a mortal, Marius was a friend of Pandora's family when she was growing up in Imperial Rome during the time of Caesar Augustus. She met Marius when she was 10, about 15 years before he became a vampire. "I would have run off with Marius then and there! But all I could do was dance around him as he went out of the vestibule and out the gate. I waved to him."

Twenty-five years later, Pandora and Marius met again. Political upheaval in Rome had forced Pandora to flee to the exotic port of Antioch. Marius was no longer alive; he had joined the ranks of the Undead. It was Marius who made Pandora immortal, and it was Marius who taught her to hunt, to kill without pain, to drink her victims' blood.

For 200 years they were together, and Marius became ever more protective of Pandora. Then they parted. It is this story that Pandora writes for Talbot, whom she meets in modern-day Paris. Pandora beckons Talbot to follow her to New Orleans. "I have strong reason to believe that Marius has gone to New Orleans, and I must be reunited with him."

And what about the vampire Lestat, the one who created Talbot? He was last seen paralyzed and silent, lying on the floor of a chapel in New Orleans. "I must seek out Lestat, to see this fallen brat Prince lying on the chapel floor unable to speak or move," Pandora says.

So, stay tuned, faithful reader. For those who have been thirsting for Lestat, Marius and dark goings-on in New Orleans, Rice promises there will be more tantalizing vampire tales to come.

Number 5 water polo wins Easterns with 5 weekend wins

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

Mission accomplished.

The No. 5 Massachusetts women's water polo team completed its domination of the east by winning all five games in Maryland this weekend and capturing the Eastern Water Polo Collegiate Championships.

UMass easily defeated their first four opponents in College Park, Md., but saw their toughest competition on the east coast against Maryland University. The Minutewomen narrowly defeated Maryland, 9–8 in the finals of this Eastern Championship Tournament.

This Eastern Championship is the first in school history for the women's water polo team. This victory also qualifies UMass for Nationals, slated for May 8–10 in Los Angeles. The Minutewomen have now won 21 consecutive games.

UMass made quick work of their early round opponents by defeating Brown, 18–1, and Princeton, 11–1, in the round robin competition. They also soundly thrashed another familiar opponent, Slippery Rock, defeating them 11–4.

Andrea Vazquez lead the team in their win over Slippery Rock, by netting six goals. The senior scored 18 in the tournament. Vazquez received help on offense from Lyndsay Crenshaw, Katie Grogan, Marcie Hupp and Sarah Newell.

In net, Peggy Nieves came through again making seven saves on eleven shots, which helped lift UMass to the victory.

In semifinal action, UMass blew away Villanova, a team they had not previously seen this season, 14–2. It was another solid performance on offense lead by Grogan who netted another four goals. Vazquez contributed by duplicating Grogan's output, while veterans Barbara Hickey and Maria Velazquez contributed with scores of their own. Nieves copied her seven save performance in the Slippery Rock game with another seven save performance versus the Wildcats.

With the win over Villanova, UMass had guaranteed a spot for themselves at Nationals, but they still had one goal in mind, winning Eastern's. UMass had gone 25–0 against eastern competition and was not about to lose their title in the last game, against a game Maryland team.

The Terrapins came out flying, and jumped out to a 5–2 lead, which was cut to 5–4 by half time.

"They really kept their composure, and came back, with the never say die attitude and won the game," said coach Dan McOsker.

UMass rallied in the second half on the strength of goals from Vazquez, which sent the game in to overtime. The first overtime produced no results, but UMass broke through in the second overtime when Hupp scored two goals to lead UMass to the title.

The unsung hero award goes to Velazquez who kept the team inspired by giving a speech in the huddle late in regulation. "We have to keep swimming out there," said Velazquez, which really motivated the team." said McOsker.

"Andrea Vazquez, played the tournament of her life and the best possible time, and helped lead the charge to the title," said McOsker.

The offensive output against Maryland again came from Vazquez who had three goals and has been red hot since returning from an injury a few weeks ago. Grogan also tallied two more goals, which brought her weekend total to 15 goals in five games. Hupp also had two scores, while Claudia Clement and Velazquez each scored one.

This game could be a blessing in disguise for UMass. It gave UMass some real tough competition that they can use as they head back to California where every game will be tough.

"We needed to play a good team like Maryland, which should help prepare us for the tougher field at National's," said McOsker.

The Minutewomen (29–3) are making their second straight appearance at Nationals. They placed ninth out of twelve teams last season, but with their great regular season results, they are looking for a story book finish to their campaign.

"As long as they all keep playing well as a team, and play well off the bench like Hickey and Crenshaw, and come together and show a winner mentality, like in the Maryland game, we should be fine," said McOsker.

After an emotional Senior Day celebration for UMass' graduating class last Sunday, the Atlantic 10 champion softball team will travel to Boston College today for a doubleheader before postseason action begins this weekend.

Track joins Penn Relays as Morency wins javelin

The University of Massachusetts and Jell-O aren't the only causes Bill Cosby likes to promote.

Held annually in Philadelphia, the Penn State Relays Carnival, a three day extravaganza, is also near the top of the actor/comedian's list of things to do.

This year, as in every year, the top grammar school, high school, college and professional athletes compete in front of more track and field spectators than any other American meet draws. One way in which this meet sets such a standard is the fact that the athletes are penned up in stalls, forced to wait their chance to prove themselves on such a large stage in such packed quarters. But that's all part of the experience.

Neither Massachusetts track team seemed to mind as both teams were represented this weekend at the 104th meeting.

UMass sophomore Vic Morency won the javelin with a toss of 215'11", smashing his school record of 203'3". Morency also placed ninth in the discus with a mark of 167'4".

Senior distance runner Rebecca Donaghue also made a good showing, grabbing third place in the 3,000m in a time of 9:47.44. That time places her third in UMass history.

The men's 4x400, relay team of Tom Toye, Neil Concepcion, Dave Cahill, and Scott Price won their qualifying heat in a time of 3:14.57, reaching second on the Massachusetts all-time list. Junior B.J. Cardota also performed well, reaching 15th place in the hammer throw with a throw of 181'5".

The teams will return to the Atlantic 10 Championships on May 2 and 3.

staff in wins. Others who may see action include senior southpaw Ryan Spillane (1–3, 3.35 ERA), senior Jon Tanney (3–2, 7.52 ERA), senior right-hander Chris Lavoie (4–3, 8.17 ERA), and freshman Brian Cain (2–0, 8.53 ERA).

On the UMass side of things, Dagliere continues to lead the team in hitting with a .450 average, and is among the conference and national leaders in that category. He also leads the team with 44 RBI. Gautreau leads the team with eight homers, and is right behind Dagliere with 43 RBI, to go along with an average around .370. Clark, Skeffington, Aaron Braunstein, Seth Kaplan, and Samela continue to hit over the .300 mark as well.

Looking ahead, UMass will travel to Olean, NY this weekend to face St. Bonaventure in a three-game set. UMass will then take on Harvard next Monday afternoon, May 4, at 1 p.m. in the Beanpot Championship. That game will be played at Fenway Park in Boston.

Suns must play without injured sixth man of-the-year Danny Manning. Danny Ainge may have a few sleepless nights thinking about the possibility of Robinson reaping the benefits of Duncan double-teams.

Reggie Miller and the Pacers simply shot the lights out in Indiana as they hosted the Cavs and dropped them to 0–2 in the opening round. Both teams shot over .400 from behind the arc in the regular season series, which they split, winning two games each.

The Lakers and Hornets were both successful early, but surprisingly it was Utah that faltered in game one. Karl Malone and the Jazz will have to be careful of any more lackadaisical outings resembling their opening debacle.

The Miami-New York series has lived up to its billing, as both have played just like they did in their previous series (2–2), in which the average margin of victory was less than four points per game. The Knicks will have to shut down Hardaway if they hope to upset the Heat. Can you say furious physicality?

Seattle seems to have caught the Jazz malaise, as Kevin Garnett and Stephon Marbury are attempting to get back into the series with a glimmer of hope. It was likely that there would be less than a glimmer when Tom Gugliotta was injured, but Anthony Peeler was a steal and he has filled in nicely thus far.

Quote of the Week: "I actually broke a sweat and I usually don't, so I guess that's what the playoffs will do." — Hornets coach Dave Cowens after Charlotte defeated Atlanta 97–87 in Game 1.

Game of the Week: It's the playoffs. Pick one.

mark. Sophomore midfielder Stephanie Pavlick built the lead to two goals with her own score after Herker. The Wildcats came back to tie it, however, and the Minutewomen needed to come out strong in the second half.

"[At first] we were tired and we just weren't mentally finishing the plays out," McClellan said. "In the second half we got our mental game going and then everything else fell into place."

Anderson knocked UMass into the place they wanted to be when she scored on an unassisted goal at 34:52. The Minutewomen then refused to look back, as they concentrated on stopping the UNH attack.

"Strategically, we did a good job at what we wanted to do," McClellan said. "I think everyone did their jobs."

UMass benefited from freshman goalie Jen Nardi's strong game in net. Nardi played the entire game while making 13 saves.

The win should give the Minutewomen even more momentum going into today's home contest with Boston University on Ruth J. Totman Field at 4:00 p.m. UMass will hope to finish out the regular season by extending their winning streak to four games and bolstering their position with respect to the ECAC championships.

"BU is a little bit different team than [BC and UNH]," McClellan said. "They're more of a midfield team. BU has had some really interesting games. It's going to be about matchups."

The Minutewomen will hope to have another solid defensive performance by sophomore defenseman Lynne Young, as UMass will have the chance to win 10 games for the first time since 1983.

Seniors Jen Bowen, Jen Herker, and Amy Leder will be playing their last home meet as they hope to push the Minutewomen's all-time mark against the Terriers to a perfect 10-0.

Is BoSox surge enough to win?

Luke Meredith
Major League Baseball

So you think Jim Leyritz is an angel sent from heaven (or at least Anaheim).

So you think Bret Saberhagen is 21 again.

So you think you're going to name your first kid Nomar (and pray for a smaller nose).

So you think your Red Sox should win the World Series.

Hey, you may not be that far from the truth.

The 1998 Boston Red Sox seem to be only a nickname away from immortality. They've come together like a dream, with the starters playing like stars, the relievers getting big outs and the role players getting big hits. It's beginning to smell like a season of destiny, 12 years after their last AL title season, 1986.

But can they keep it up?

By breaking it all down into cute subheads, we can see.

Pitching:

Pedro Martinez has been better than advertised, and has given the starters a jump. But maybe the best April has come from Bret Saberhagen, who seems to have finally shaken off years of arm trouble. If Saberhagen can keep it up, him and Pedro form a championship 1–2 punch. Tim Wakefield has been Tim Wakefield, which is fine. The key here might be keeping Butch Henry healthy. When he can stay injury free, Henry is a more than solid lefthander. Not only that, but keeping Henry in the rotation will allow Jimmy Williams to keep Derek Lowe in the bullpen, where he has been sensational. Brian Rose has thrown well so far, and knowing he doesn't have to be the man — yet — will aid his development.

The bullpen has been excellent, except for Steve Avery and Dennis Eckersley. Five years ago, both were as good as any pitcher in the game, but that was five years ago. Lowe's emergence as a force in the pen has helped to soften Eckersley's lack of effectiveness, and Tom Gordon has thrived in his closer role. All they have to do is keep it up.

Key: Saberhagen and Henry stay healthy, and bullpen continues to keep Boston in games.

Offense:

What the Red Sox have displayed so far offensively is the one thing you can't teach — ability to step up in the clutch. Guys like Darren Bragg, Mo Vaughn, Nomar Garciaparra, Jim Leyritz, et al, have gotten the hits when they've counted, and that's why the Sox keep winning after the seventh inning.

Vaughn and Garciaparra have been their usual sensational selves, which will become much more important as the season drags on and the miracles don't happen every night. Troy O'Leary has shown some power, which is critical because they're not going to get much more power from the outfielders with Bragg and Darren Lewis starting.

Key: Get Leyritz as many at–bats as possible, and O'Leary has to continue to display better than average power.

The Red Sox are as good as any team in baseball, because they are a team. The credit for that must go to Jimmy Williams, who has done a helluva job.

But the Red Sox picked a bad division to start up a dream season. The Yankees are probably the best team in baseball, and Baltimore is right up there as well. But the Orioles starters have been injury prone already this season — Mike Mussina and Scott Kamieniecki currently sit on the DL — and the bullpen was exposed this weekend against Oakland.

This Red Sox team has shown incredible character in the early going, the one intangible everyone tries for but few achieve. Like the Braves in 1991, the Phillies in 1993 and the Dodgers in 1988 showed, good pitching, special role players and a sprinkle of dust from the baseball gods can overcome any supposed talent deficiency.

So if you're wondering if the Red Sox are the first team to win with such magic, then the answer is no. But if you're wondering if team like these 1998 Red Sox have kept it up, the answer is a resounding yes. Baseball has always had a place in October for teams of destiny, and right now the Red Sox are on track to be that team. So maybe Jim Leyritz is an angel. Maybe Bret Saberhagen is 21 again. Maybe the baseball gods have sprinkled their yearly dose of magic dust in Boston.

And hey, maybe you should name your first child Nomar. Seems to be a pretty lucky name already.

UM lacrosse heads into finale with win

Most of us have heard the old adage "defense wins games" over and over again. Yet somehow, it manages to avoid becoming a trite saying. It is games like that played by the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team Sunday that are the cause for its continual reinforcement.

As UMass (9–4) travelled to Durham to face the University of New Hampshire in their last road dual meet of the year, the players and coaches knew that they were headed into the land of a scoring machine, as the Wildcats have averaged over 20 goals this season.

Undaunted, the Minutewomen practically shut down the UNH scoring attack and held the Wildcats to only one goal in the second half to give them the 8–4 victory.

"The defense did a beautiful job of not panicking, holding body and really just stopping the fast break," Massachusetts coach Francesca McClellan said. "We certainly created a lot of problems for them."

Led by junior midfielder Melissa Anderson's career–high three goals, UMass took their third straight win in a row, as they have won five out of their last six. The one loss in that time span came at the hands of a talented Syracuse squad which, ironically, was also fairly well–contained considering their explosiveness and twenty–plus goals per game average.

"We really prevented their go–to kids from getting the ball a lot," McClellan said. "We managed to hold their lead player to only two goals because we played great defense."

The Minutewomen's nine wins are the most since 1987 when UMass went 9–5 under then head coach Pam Hixon. If the Minutewomen can garner a win against Boston University today, their double–digit win total will be a strong case for UMass to grab a spot in the ECAC Championships.

"If we win [today's] game it will look good for us to make it to ECAC's," Anderson said. "We know we can do it. Everyone knows we have a chance of going."

UNH and the Minutewomen were tied at three goals a piece going into the half but never trailed as senior midfielder Jen Herker started the scoring for UMass at the 3:48

Women's crew takes A–10's

By Aaron M. Saykin
Collegian Staff

Although the Massachusetts women's crew team may have struggled a bit during the regular season, it managed to silence any doubters on Saturday by trouncing every conference foe en route to a third consecutive Atlantic 10 Championship crown.

After suffering a crippling loss to Northeastern one week before the A–10 Championship race, UMass head coach Jim Dietz was eager to prove that his crew possessed excellent speed. With the recent luxury of relatively calm waters of the Cooper River in New Jersey, the Minutewomen annihilated their competition behind the monster performances of the varsity heavyweight and lightweight eight.

"It's hard to say that it could have been a better weekend," Dietz said of his team's near–perfect racing. "We won every event handily. All crews were just incredible."

Before entering the race, one of Dietz's major concerns was potential spoiler George Washington, whom he described as "getting stronger all season." Despite a strong showing by the Colonials, UMass captured six of the nine races for a total of 54 points. GW finished second with a score of 46, and Fordham and Temple tied for the third spot with a distant point total of 16.

"I thought the race we lost to Northeastern was a fluke, but after that we knew that GW really had a shot at [beating] us" Dietz said. "They've raced well lately, and it was supposed to be close, but we just dominated. We beat them by at least 12 seconds in our two varsity eight races. This is how we should have rowed all season."

Although the Minutewomen won two thirds of the races, the Colonials were within striking range throughout the entire competition, finishing second in each UMass victory, and claiming first place in the lightweight four race.

"The fours [quad boats] saved us Saturday because our point totals were so close," said Dietz, who was named Atlantic 10 coach of the year for the third time in his tenure at UMass. "We finished 1–2 with GW in almost every race, and every point counted."

In addition to the lightweight and varsity eight boats, the second varsity eight, both novice eight boats and the quad boat posted victories for UMass. The novice four finished second behind GW in its race.

As champions of the A–10 for the third consecutive season, the Minutewomen have established themselves as the true power within their conference. After finishing second in the NCAA Championship in 1997, the UMass program has attained national stardom— something which Dietz feels will rub off on the A–10 Conference.

"I think it was a really big week end for us for a couple of reasons," said the two–time Olympic coach. "We want to see the A–10 become as strong in rowing as it is in basketball, and by us being at that regatta, the other schools can see what it takes to get on top."

Despite stumbling upon regular–season hurdles in the form of Virginia and Northeastern, the Minutewomen reasserted themselves as one of the top two crews in the Northeast. With another month of preparation before the NCAA Championships, Dietz remains confident that his crew will sprint to the finish. In 1997, Virginia edged UMass in their regular season showdown; however, during championship weekend, the Minutewomen toppled the Cavaliers by a commanding eight seconds.

"We're coming into our own now," he said. "Everybody's getting a feel for things. We are starting to gain momentum toward the NCAA's."

Rams down UM Minutemen in series finale, 10-1

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

Rain forced the final game of a three game series between the Massachusetts and Rhode Island baseball teams from Sunday to yesterday afternoon in Kingston, RI.

Unfortunately, the rain also washed away the potent UMass offensive attack that has been posting almost 10 runs a game.

The Rams downed the Minutemen 10–1 in the series finale, but the loss can be downplayed in a sense: UMass won both games of a doubleheader on Saturday by identical 2–1 scores, and took home their second Atlantic 10 Eastern Division title in as many years.

In addition, the Minutemen have also clinched a spot in the A–10 tournament which will be held from May 8–10 in Boyertown, Penn.

Scott Barnsby originally got the ball on Sunday afternoon and allowed a pair of runs in a little over an inning of work. However, the rain forced UMass coach Mike Stone to go with Jeff Puleri to finish up the game. Puleri worked the final six and two–thirds innings of work, but could only watch as URI pitcher Jon Scullin mowed down the Minutemen.

Scullin tossed a complete game four–hitter, retiring 20 of the 25 batters he faced on yesterday, and led the Rams to a convincing victory over UMass.

Junior catcher Brian Samela paced the UMass offense with a 2–for–3 afternoon. Senior second baseman Muchie Dagliere got back on the hit parade after seeing his 31–game hitting streak get snapped on Saturday by adding an RBI double. With that RBI, Dagliere tied the UMass record for career RBI with 171.

Bryan Mazzaferro had the other hit for the Minutemen.

UMass (24–10, 13–2 in the Atlantic 10) will now set its sights on a date with the University of Vermont, a 3 p.m. start in Burlington, VT. These two teams met in the Homestead Challenge back on March 18, with UMass coming out on top 18–5.

Shaun Skeffington went 3–for–5 with three runs scored and four RBI, while Dagliere added two runs scored and four RBI in the first meeting. Doug Clark, Pete Gautreau, Samela, and Matt Wolcott all added a pair of RBI apiece. Travis Veracka hurled seven innings to earn the win.

The Catamounts enter today's contest with a 22–14 mark, 12–8 in America East play. They have won 15 of their last 21 contests, and are riding a six game winning streak into today's game.

The top offensive threats for Vermont include senior Keith Carter, who is hitting .403 with 34 RBI, and Wade Rikert, who is hitting at a .371 clip. Senior Dana Forsberg, infielder Michael Cole, senior Heath Squires, outfielder Kyle Rikert, and infielder Matt Bryant are also hitting over .300.

Sophomore right–hander Trevor Marcotte leads the Catamounts with a 2–0 mark with a 2.61 earned run average in 14 appearances on the year. Senior righty Chris Bajda and junior Jason Spaulding have each posted a 5–2 mark to lead the Second baseman Muchie Dagliere, who just set the new UMass record for consecutive games with a hit, and the rest of the UMass baseball team played Rhode Island this weekend and will face Vermont today.

Bulls ready to focus; Duncan gains honors

Vulnerable? That's the word being thrown in the direction of the defending world champion Chicago Bulls after another close game, albeit a win, against an upstart New Jersey club. Although last Sunday's game versus the Nets was not as close as the score would indicate, a 96–91 Chicago win,

Jamie Jee
AP

New Jersey did manage to close the gap which had grown as large as 21 points. After Friday's narrow overtime win, questions have resurfaced concerning the thirty–something saga that is the Bulls. They lead the series 2–0 and next travel to take on the Nets tomorrow.

Obviously Chicago did not seem as intense during the regular season as it has been in previous years. That was because there was no reason to be. They had already sailed through the 70–win gala and this year they simply needed to prepare themselves for the playoffs to complete their second three–peat this decade.

Amid talk of the team breaking up after what many believe is another championship in the wings, the –Bulls have done what a dynasty does — win. Yes, Michael Jordan may retire. Yes, it is likely Scottie Pippen will leave. Yes, Phil Jackson could be on his way to NBC. None of that, however, will happen until a great team makes at least one last run to remain the best in the world.

When compared to the previous Chicago teams that had much less controversy, injury and internal conflict associated with them, it is amazing that the Bulls are still poised to further cement their stake as one of the best teams to ever play in the NBA. Jordan has become the league, that process quickening with the departure of Larry Bird and Magic Johnson. It only seems natural that he will leave on his own terms, writing his own history in perhaps his final quest.

As the legends prevent themselves from becoming a part of the past (both Bird and Magic remain involved with the Pacers and Lakers), other players are striving to lay a strong foundation for the future. Among them is rookie Tim Duncan, whose banner year has been key to raising the height of Spurs basketball to its former position. Duncan was perfunctorily named Rookie of the Year, garnering 113 of 116 possible votes, the highest percentage since Shaquille O'Neal in 1992–93. Duncan, along with Tim Hardaway, was also named to the 1998 USA World Championship Team.

Duncan has joined the towering frontcourt of David Robinson and Will Perdue to formulate a near given edge on the boards against any team. He scored 32 points in his playoff debut, 18 coming in the fourth quarter as San Antonio rallied past the Suns in the series opener.

Although Phoenix came back to even the series at one game a piece, the Spurs have the advantage of now returning to the Alamodome. As the

Iraq objects to U.N. searches

UNITED NATIONS (AP) — Seeking to carve out new support on the Security Council, Iraq's foreign minister pledged yesterday to cooperate with the United Nations to refute "lies and allegations" that Baghdad is still holding illegal arms.

At the same time, Foreign Minister Mohammed Saeed al-Sahhaf raised objections to U.N. parameters for future arms searches of presidential sites, raising the specter of further brinkmanship over Baghdad's weapons programs.

Al-Sahhaf yesterday repeated a longtime Iraqi claim that his country destroyed all banned weapons by the end of 1991, accusing the United States and Britain of acting out a vendetta against Iraq.

But the chief U.N. weapons inspector said Iraq itself has acknowledged holding banned munitions after 1991. Richard Butler said his teams had found artillery shells with "perfectly good chemical warfare agent within them."

McVeigh's attorneys argue for new trial

DENVER (AP) — Timothy McVeigh's lawyers told a federal appeals court yesterday that he deserves a new trial in the Oklahoma City bombing because of juror misconduct and the publication of a purported confession from him just before the case began.

The lawyers also argued in front of a three-judge panel of the 10th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that the judge at the trial, Richard Matsch, unfairly restricted questioning of prospective jurors about the death penalty.

Prosecutor Sean Connelly countered that the jury that convicted McVeigh and sentenced him to death for the April 1995 bombing of the Oklahoma City federal building was impartial and diligent. The bombing claimed 168 lives.

A ruling from the appeals is not expected before the summer. The claim of juror misconduct stemmed from a comment one juror allegedly made to another during a recess, before the prosecution's case was completed and the defense had started.

According to defense attorney Robert Nigh, the juror said: "We know what the verdict should be."

Second election for SGA positions today, tomorrow

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

New elections will be held today and tomorrow for the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) president and student trustee due to the nullification of the last elections after unconstitutional elections practices were discovered.

Regardless of the illegal election practices, the outcome of the first election could not be nullified because of the resignation of then–Chancellor of Elections Carlos Alvarez.

Alvarez resigned before submitting an election report which required his signature, as well as those of the elections commissioners. In order for the senate to ratify the elections, they must have this report.

The SGA was then left in confusion because there is not a course of action outlined in the constitution if the report is not handed in.

The senate decided the best course of action would be to leave the decision to the judiciary. The student judiciary is the supreme court for the SGA.

The SGA decided to vote on the ratification of the elections even though they knew it was not a decision, but a recommendation to the student judiciary. The judiciary had the final word on ratification.

Amy Pellegrino, who won the original election, was sworn in as president on April 1 following the senate's ratification of the elections. She held office until the judiciary voted to nullify the elections on April 13.

The judiciary's decision to ratify or nullify depended upon the two petitions filed with the student judiciary during the original elections in March. In the petitions, various candidates were accused of unlawful election practices and unconstitutional ways the election was being run.

One of the two petitions heard before the judiciary caused the nullification of the original SGA elections.

Jesse Burchfield, former candidate for president and Brenda Fitzpatrick, former candidate for student trustee, filed a petition against Alvarez claiming he used unconstitutional practices when running the elections.

Burchfield and Fitzpatrick's primary complaint was that he did not make absentee ballots available at the polling places.

The student judiciary nullified the elections on April 13 after finding this complaint and others in the petition unconstitutional and mandated April 29 and 30 as the dates for the new elections.

Due to the nullification, the president's office immediately became vacant and, using the chain of command to fill the vacancy, Speaker Peter Kilbourne became president until the new elections could be held.

The new elections for SGA president and student trustee are today and tomorrow. Polling places will be open from 11 a.m.–2 p.m. and 4–7 p.m. Students can vote in all dining commons on campus. Commuter students can vote in the Campus Center Concourse or the Newman Center.

Wolf speaks on feminism

Social critic discusses women's rights in lecture

ALEXANDER KOROMILAS / COLLEGIAN

Naomi Wolf spoke of an inclusive feminism last night at the Fine Arts Center.

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

Naomi Wolf, author, feminist and social critic, said the Anita Hill–Clarence Thomas trial was a catalyst for a wave of changes for women in a lecture given last night.

Wolf said the Hill trial triggered women to vote and spend their money in more useful ways.

"Seventy–six years after women got the vote they were finally using it in a way to make a difference," she said. "What's been happening, women began to spend their money in new ways to get powerful men to listen to them."

In addition to social changes caused by the Hill trial, Wolf cited statistics to illustrate the influence of the trial.

"Emily's List, which is a pro–choice, Democratic Political Action Committee (PAC) has made $6 million and tripled the women on the Hill. It is now the biggest PAC in America. Bigger than the National Rifle Association," Wolf said.

Wolf explained how women could accomplish "a bloodless national coup."

"The $6 million [given to Emily's List] when you work it out is six cents per U.S. woman. But if every women in America, if she could afford it, could send $6 to the PAC of their choice that would be $600 million. It would be a bloodless national coup," Wolf said.

Wolf outlined two different types of feminism.

"There is victim feminism and power feminism," Wolf said. "Victim feminism is like saying to a rape victim, 'Keep a stiff upper lip.' You should have known better than to go into that guy's room with him. It creates moral blind spots."

Wolf described her preferred type of feminism.

"Power feminism is inclusive, open and sexually tolerant. It says what every women does in her bed with her body is her business. It's interested in pleasure and joy [in a feminist movement]," Wolf said.

Candidates answer ALANA concerns

By Elana Premack
Collegian Staff

A small group of Asian, Latino, African, Native American (ALANA) students met in a roundtable discussion with Student Government Association (SGA) presidential candidates Amy Pellegrino and Salwa Shamapande on Monday night to discuss issues relevant to the ALANA community.

Three questions that had been decided upon previously were asked of each candidate. Pellegrino and Shamapande individually addressed their relationships with the ALANA community, touching on their personal contributions to helping ALANA students in both the past and future as well as their assessments of their responsibilities to the ALANA community.

Shamapande cited his work in the Dean of Students office advising ALANA students, his participation in the Black Student Union and his work for the Office of ALANA Affairs as ways in which he had provided assistance to the ALANA community.

Hillel panel discusses Jews, homosexuality

By Morgan Tobor
Collegian Correspondent

"Oy Veh, I'm Gay," a panel which discussed homosexuality and Judaism Monday evening at the University of Massachusetts was composed of three representatives in the Jewish Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual, Transgender (GLBT) community.

Each panel member gave a brief background on their personal experiences with homosexuality and Judaism and addressed issues from levels of religious beliefs, personal tales of coming out, shared stories about when their families were told and their roles in the Jewish community today.

The three representatives were Jonathan Krasner, Felica Mednick and Felice Yeskel.

Krasner is a doctoral student of Jewish history at Brandeis University in Waltham.

Mednick holds a master's degree in early childhood education and is currently a tutor in Amherst. She has been an active member for 10 years of Havurat Shalom, an organization which provides egalitarian Jewish services for the greater Boston community.

Yeskel works at UMass as the director of the Stonewall Center, which she founded in 1985. She is also an adjunct member of the Social Justice Education Program in the school of education.

Questions were then asked by the audience pertaining to the issues of homosexuality, Judaism and homosexuality's place in Judaism.

Panelists were asked the question, "How do the different Jewish communities view sexuality?"

Krasner said that to his knowledge the Orthodox Jews oppose homosexuality completely; conservative Jews do not ordain openly gay Rabbis, but they are welcoming of gays in the synagogue; and reformed and reconstructionist Jews do ordain openly gay Rabbis, but they leave it to the Rabbi's discretion whether or not to perform commencement ceremonies.

The idea of this panel came about after Jesse Pasackow, a sophomore social thought political economy (STEPC) major, attended a National GLBT Jewish Leadership conference at the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor, which hosted a variety of workshops, speakers and ideas for dealing with Jewish queer life.

Pasackow brought the idea of the panel to UMass's Hillel House and planned it with the help of Lissa Loeb, the Jewish Campus Service Corps Fellow, Sharon Kubo, a junior communications major, and Lena Shendelman, an undeclared sophomore.

"The focus of the panel and discussion is to be a resource and provide more information for homosexuals dealing with their

Ariz. Supreme Court denies English–only language law

By Paul Davenport
Associated Press

PHOENIX (AP) — The Arizona Supreme Court yesterday struck down as unconstitutional a voter-approved law requiring that official state and local business be conducted only in English.

Opponents of the measure branded it as racist, while supporters called it common sense and promised to appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court.

State Sen. Pete Rios, a Democrat who was among the plaintiffs in the case decided yesterday, said the measure's supporters played on unjustified fears of those who cannot speak other languages.

"There is no movement in the state of Arizona to replace English as the official language of this state," Rios said. "People accept that English is the official language of this state."

Robert D. Park, an activist who campaigned for the law's passage and intervened in the court cases to defend it, said he would appeal in federal court, hopefully directly to the Supreme Court.

"The First Amendment applies to private speech, not government speech. What they're saying here now is that... a government employee has a right to choose what language to do business in," Park said. "That is totally unacceptable."

Several court challenges left the measure in legal limbo since voters approved it in 1988 as an amendment to the Arizona Constitution. A different challenge than the one decided Tuesday was left unresolved last year when the U.S. Supreme Court refused to rule on it.

The state Supreme Court ruled the law violates free-speech rights under the U.S. Constitution.

"The amendment adversely affects non-English-speaking persons and impinges on their ability to seek and obtain information and services from government," the opinion said.

Also, because the measure "chills First Amendment rights that government is not otherwise entitled to proscribe," it also violates the U.S. Constitution's 14th Amendment's equal-protection clause, the opinion added.

However, the state high court said it was expressing no opinion on the constitutionality of less restrictive English-only provisions nor discussing the legality of efforts that are limited to promoting English.

"We also emphasize that nothing in this opinion compels any Arizona governmental entity to provide any service in a language other than English," the opinion said.

Arizona is among at least 21 states that have enacted official English laws, though the Arizona version is more restrictive than most. Most of the others are largely symbolic, with several merely stating that English is the state's official language.

The Arizona measure required the state and its political subdivisions to "act in English and no other language" and prohibited them from making laws or policies that required the use of a language other than English. Also, no government document "shall be valid, effective or enforceable unless it is in the English language."

It allowed exceptions to comply with federal law, to protect the rights of crime victims and defendants, to protect public health and safety and to teach students in bilingual education.

Attorney General Grant Woods' office had defended the law as constitutional because it was limited in scope, but an aide said Woods welcomed the latest ruling.

"It's probably a good thing because we didn't need English only anyway," Woods spokeswoman Karie Dozer said.

Wolf also described the differences between women's expectations for the future when they were 9–years–old and now.

"When you were 9–years–old, you had no qualms about decision–making ability, no qualms about being a leader. What happened? You turned 11," Wolf said. "You learned not to shine too bright because other girls would not like you. Girls equalize each other in a downward direction. When you're 13 and babysitting when the parents want to pay you, you say, 'Oh, whatever you want.'"

Wolf said women feel they can't get high paying jobs.

"If employers want to weed out women, they just advertise the position at a higher salary. Before the world can even come to you and make you not feel okay with power and tell you you're not intelligent enough you have already done it to yourself," Wolf said.

Wolf said there are new archetypes of women appearing in popular culture.

"There are three new archetypes of women bubbling up in popular culture, the first is the Diana principle," Wolf said. "This is an archetype of women who refuse to be humiliated any longer.

"The second is the Sheba principle. This is an archetype of women being in roles of power. [For example,] Ruth Bader Ginsberg being appointed to the Supreme Court and expanding roles for women in combat.

"The third archetype is the Nike principle. Nike was the goddess of victory. Women are only in 14 percent of all media and that 14 percent women are usually sex objects or victims," Wolf said.

The lecture was sponsored by the Distinguished Visitors Program.

He hopes to create a stronger ALANA caucus in which all seats are continually filled and each ALANA student has a representative from his community on the caucus.

"I want the caucus to fit what the acronym stands for," Shamapande said.

Pellegrino is currently trying to break down barriers in the SGA between the ALANA caucus and the Pro–Student caucus, a group of right–of–center SGA senators who meet regularly to discuss SGA issues.

As a member of a less traditional minority group, Republicans in the University of Massachusetts senate, Pellegrino can "appreciate the problem [of expression] that other minority groups have."

Concerning her plans to help ALANA students in the future, Pellegrino would like to publicize fine arts programming which is related to the ALANA community.

The questions raised in the roundtable discussion were both directly related to ALANA students and the campus community as a whole.

"Chances are that if it's an ALANA issue it's a campus– wide issue," Pellegrino said. "If it's an ALANA issue, it's a student issue."

SGA president, trustee candidates

Editor's note: Profiles run in the March 9 issue of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian are being reprinted for the second Student Government Association elections. The profile of Eleanor Court has been modified from its original form. It has been updated at her request. Other candidates did not wish to change their profiles.

Amy Pellegrino for president

Amy Pellegrino, a sophomore political science and history major, has been involved with the SGA for two years.

In her first year, Pellegrino was on the Women's Issues committee and select arts and was an advocate for Title VII. Pellegrino has also served as the Women's Issues chairperson and is a member of the Ways and Means Committee.

Pellegrino, if elected as the SGA president, would work to support Registered Student Organizations (RSOs) and would help RSOs by alleviating the overcrowding in RSO offices.

"I would work on space allocation. You have things like Hillel, Theater Guild and Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (MASSPIRG) all in the same office. I want to make that a big priority," Pellegrino said.

In addition to space allocation, Pellegrino would create a programming board for RSOs.

"The program board selecting times for RSOs to do programming and it would have a main schedule so there won't be RSO programming overlaps. It would help with advertising and really help the small RSOs. The small RSOs need help especially with breakthrough stuff," Pellegrino said.

Student businesses are also a priority to Pellegrino.

"Helping student businesses is definitely important. I want to put student businesses first. They add to the character that makes UMass, UMass," Pellegrino said.

Campus safety is a major issue in Pellegrino's campaign.

"We did a safety walk with Women's Issues [last Spring]. A lot of lighting problems are trees [so, cutting back branches] can improve up to 60 percent. Some say the orange lights aren't bright enough, but they give off light to a bigger area than the white lights. You really do need to have a background in this," Pellegrino said.

Another security issue for Pellegrino is 24–hour card access.

"Twenty–four–hour card — all it does is secure the administration from lawsuits and make parents feel better. A lot of schools have a 24–hour person and that is a bigger deterrent. [Card access] is a minor inconvenience. Anyone who wants to can get into the building. I did it when I went to get signatures for my nomination. People hold the door for you," Pellegrino said.

Pellegrino would like to improve relations between University Productions and Concerts (UPC) and the SGA.

"I would like to build connections between these two groups. UPC can't get back on their feet if they continue to have an antagonistic relationship with the SGA," Pellegrino said.

Salwa Shamapande for president

Salwa Shamapande, a sophomore computer systems engineering major, started in government by working as an administrative assistant to former Student Government Association (SGA) president, Maurice Caston.

Shamapande is now the Secretary of University Policy for the SGA. In the past Shamapande has worked with the Black Student Union and Nummo News.

Shamapande said the main issue of his candidacy for the SGA presidency is the Course And Teacher Evaluation (CATE) guide.

"It's the issue I've spent most of the semester on. At the end of every semester each student does an evaluation and gives it to the SGA or whoever we decide should handle it. Then it will be posted on the Internet. It's an idea based on customer service," Shamapande said.

Deferred maintenance is also high on Shamapande's priority list on a basis of "Fix what you broke."

"I like to put it as 'fix what you broke.' There is $393 million dollars' worth of deferred maintenance. This is something that won't be accomplished in a year. Next year is an election year [for the state legislature]. We need to put in someone that makes this is a high priority. My part would be to register students to vote, to put pressure on state legislatures to care about this," Shamapande said.

Shamapande spoke of ways students cause costly damage.

"Every weekend there is $15,000–$50,000 in damage done to the dorms. Those benches lining the walkway to Whitmore, there's one knocked over everyday. It costs $60 everytime they are put back up. Students are the one who pay for these damages," Shamapande said.

In the interest of students required to be at the first two classes of a course, Shamapande would lengthen Whitmore business hours to times when most students aren't in classes.

"A report was done that showed that 13,000 students were in class from 11 a.m.–4 p.m. You don't go to class so you can pay a bill," Shamapande said.

Shamapande would also call for an inner review of the SGA to make it more efficient to do work for the students.

"I would call for an inner review of the SGA which would ultimately help students. Getting senators to go out and get 20 signatures [before proposing a motion]. This way we'd stay in contact with the students," Shamapande said.

With out–of state tuitions rising Shamapande would work to keep tuition for all students low.

"I'd make sure tuition and fees stay low. I've seen a lot of [candidates' promises on] fliers that would keep fees high. All the things we are proposing would not raise tuition and fees," Shamapande said.

Eleanor Court for SGA trustee

Eleanor Court, a junior neurobiology major, has been involved with the SGA since her freshman year. Starting as treasurer of the Orchard Hill Area Government her freshman year, Court moved up to the position of Area Governor her sophomore year and also worked with the Board of Trustees as assistant trustee. Now in her junior year, Court is the student representative on the Board of Higher Education.

If elected student trustee, Court's priorities will be the Course And Teacher Evaluation (CATE) guide, the off– campus alcohol policy, lowering costs for students and getting credits for students involved in extra–curricular activities.

The CATE guide is currently in collective bargaining to be approved. Court feels pressure needs to be kept on the administration through the bargaining process to keep it a high priority.

"Who knows how long collective bargaining is going to go? We need to keep pressure while bargaining is going on with the administration. We need to follow through," Court said.

Another issue Court plans to work on if elected is the off–campus alcohol policy.

"I've been working on it since November. I'm going to ask the Board of Higher Education to revise the policy," Court said.

Court has been working on the policy with SGA members.

"Recently I've been working with other students in the SGA to protect student rights regarding revisions in the policy and I feel it's important that since I've been working on it all year that I can continue in the coming year because future revisions will be made," Court said.

If elected SGA trustee, Court will work on a project to give credits to students involved in extra–curricular activities.

"Students in co–curricular activities get credit. I think it should be expanded to include athletes and RSO leaders who are so committed. We're trying to get some recognition for RSO leaders and athletes," Court said.

Court agrees with the goal of 20 percent of students being Asian, Latino, African, Native Americans (ALANA) students, if it represents the state's population.

"It's absolutely essential our University population reflect our community. We're a public school and we should have equal access to all residents of the state," Court said.

On the issue of drinking on campus, Court feels there needs to be stronger support services.

"My main concern is that support services are very lacking. They're not adequately funded or staffed," Court said.

Erik Hansen for SGA trustee

Erik Hansen, a sophomore political science major, became interested in running for SGA student trustee when he heard about the elections from a friend.

Some of the major issues Hansen would work towards if elected student trustee is getting more student involvement in the SGA, an ATM in Southwest, student body diversity and an on–campus bar.

In order to increase student involvement, Hansen wants students who are concerned about an issue to create a proposal themselves which Hansen would then bring to the senate.

"I want the people who are interested in the work to do it. I would love for people who know the issue to come in and say, 'We're not getting this,' so they can do the work too. I'd have a staff of 3,000 kids, like committees in the trustee department," Hansen said.

Basing his candidacy on student involvement, Hansen would have the students in Southwest mobilize to get the ATM.

"I don't think it's not feasible. I'm hearing all this stuff about it but nobody is doing anything about it. It's not going to happen as one guy sits at his desk. It has to be a group of students," Hansen said.

Hansen sites self–segregation of students as a problem to work on if elected.

"It's not good to have different groups all staying in groups because of where they came from. [The university is] a mixing of kids who milk cows at 5:30 in the morning to kids who are from other countries. I'd like it to be a bigger mix but it's a matter of getting people to come here," Hansen said.

In order to reduce alcohol–related accidents, Hansen feels an on–campus bar would help.

"We want an on–campus bar. People say we have the Top Of Campus (TOC) but it's not student–oriented. I'd rather have a bar on–campus because it's safer. It would reduce drunk driving," Hansen said.

Hansen feels a regulated system dealing with alcohol would be safer.

"They should have a regulated system. It's going to happen anyway so why not make it safer?" Hansen said.

In order to ensure a Spring Concert, Hansen feels drawing on the support of students will make it happen.

"I'm saying what are you going to do about it? How hard is it if you have 15,000 kids who want it? If you put an ad in the paper saying 'If you want a Spring Concert come down to the dean's office, the next thing you know you have a line out the door," Hansen said.

Jeffrey Howe for SGA trustee

Jeffrey Howe, a sophomore political science and sociology major, has been part of the SGA for two years at the University of Massachusetts.

Howe has been a senator for two years, serving on the Finance Committee and the Dining Services Committee. In addition, he has been an active member of House Council.

Howe, if elected student trustee, plans to work on campus safety, keeping tuition and fees down and gaining more funding for the University.

Howe pointed out problems with campus security.

"Last year [there was a motion] to have more lighting and call boxes placed on the 'rape trail' but, because the trail is not recognized by the University, they won't put call boxes or lighting there. If call boxes are put there then the University is responsible for what goes on there. Some places that now have call boxes and lights are much more secure than that path," Howe said.

Howe believes if there aren't significant changes in the University then student fees should not be raised.

"A state education is intended to be a quality education at an affordable price. And unless there is some significant improvement that students can see, then fees should stay the same or be lowered," Howe said.

The Board of Trustees would pay for differed maintenance under Howe's plan to make it a high priority.

"[Funding for deferred maintenance] can only come from two places: the state or students' pockets. With the price so high nobody but the state could provide the funding," Howe said.

Howe feels there is a problem with recruiting Asian, Latin, African, Native American (ALANA) students.

"Approximately 18,000 students apply, 16,000 are accepted but only 3,000–4,000 come here. The problem is not getting people to apply; the problem is convincing them to come to this school. We need an aggressive recruiting and retention program of ALANA students. I do think 20 percent is a good idea," Howe said.

Howe said the most important responsibility of the student trustee is to advocate for students rights.

"[The student trustee's job] is to ensure student rights on campus and make sure student needs are not forgotten. Be an advocate for student rights and responsibilities to the state legislature and administration and ensure quality and affordable education that is practical and of use in the real world," Howe said.

Howe feels banning alcohol will not stop drinking.

"Alcohol is a problem with any group of students. People under 21 are going to drink anyway. It's only making more work for the police," Howe said.

Back Bulger

Question the answers

The University of Massachusetts is a ripe target for those with an agenda. Anytime a group has access to 25,000 college kids, they know they're likely to have some influence. Apparently this was the Friends of Jesus' thinking when they made their way here from Maine last week.

Like most whom I've spoken with, I found the group's anti-gay, anti-welfare, anti-abortion message to be more than offensive. But that doesn't mean they don't have the right to spread it. UMass is, after all, a public institution, and it has a responsibility to allow whoever wants to make a statement to make it.

Gerrit DeYoung

What makes their views so distasteful isn't that most disagree with them, it's that they're largely based on false information, or opinion posing as fact. Apparently attempting to put us on "the righteous path," they handed out a variety of heavy-handed tracts attempting to back their views with quotes from the Bible and dubious experts. I'd intended to pick up their anti-gay polemic, but hateful missives all tend to look the same, and I grabbed the "What's Wrong with Fornication?" packet instead. Although probably not as distasteful as its homophobic counterpart, it still had plenty to wince at.

I think their attitude is summed up well in card No. 2 (out of a total of 13), in which they claim, "Take any tool and use it for something that it was not intended for, and you will damage it." The monumental (and false) assumption is that the human body wasn't designed for premarital sex. It's not as though one's sex organs undergo some monumental change after marriage. What the tract correctly points out is that STDs are more likely when one is involved in multiple sexual relationships. But that's where the factual information ends. The card goes on to debunk what it views as myths surrounding condoms and sexual education. Its basic argument is that the approaches aren't working; if they were, STDs wouldn't be such a problem. It even goes so far as to blame sexual education for rampant teenage sexuality and skyrocketing abortion rates.

Again the Friends of Jesus have conveniently crucial information in their quest to lord over our sex lives. We live in a promiscuous culture. Individually and collectively we've made the decision to exercise more sexual freedom than ever before. Along with this freedom, like any other, comes certain consequences. Sex education and the use of prophylactics are responses to, not causes of, sex's risks. Lord knows how many people would have STDs or become pregnant were they denied access to the information and materials necessary to thwart them.

The group goes on to make a wide variety of largely false assumptions: welfare mothers "with governments aid and payments from the children's fathers... make out pretty good," "fornication hampers mental productivity," and that abortion will lead women to "carry around feelings of guilt and shame for the rest of [their] life." While I find the opinions themselves disturbing, the real problem is that the Friends of Jesus insist upon presenting them as hard-and-fast fact. Not only do they assume that what they've conceived in their own minds is factually correct, they believe that others have to think the same way they do.

Their assumptions are dangerous on a variety of levels. First, they're largely factually unfounded. Second, they try to control people's actions through a fairly limited and limiting ideology. Not all of us are Christians, and those who are don't necessarily interpret the Bible the way the Friends of Jesus do. Third, their message inspires guilt, not change. They make people think that their innate desires are a result of moral weakness rather than genetic programming. All too often, guilt leads people to make the wrong decisions and feel ashamed rather than make informed decisions and accept the consequences.

The Friends of Jesus miss probably the most obvious consequence of their heavy-handed claims: not only do they dissuade many from making the kind of decisions they support, they also drive many away from their church. They portray religion as a mean-spirited limiting endeavor, rather than the vehicle for growth it could be. Unfortunately, views like their's will always exist. But as long as they're countered with legitimate information, the damage they do can be contained.

Crisis in Iraq: part two

When never again is right now

The embargo on Iraq that American officials have imposed for the last seven years has produced a quiet holocaust.

So far, at least one and a half million Iraqis, mostly children, have died because of the lack of food and medicine, and the situation continues to deteriorate. Best estimates suggest that some 300 Iraqis die every day as a direct result.

This genocide is being conducted in the name of, supposedly on behalf of, the people of the United States.

Hussein Ibish

American government officials insist that you benefit from this holocaust, that you need and want it to continue.

So what do you do when never again is right now?

Increasingly, people around this nation are standing up to say that this pointless mass murder is unacceptable and that the U.S. government does not have their support in systematically targeting, through sanctions, the most poor, sick, elderly and vulnerable in its vendetta against the Iraqi people.

The uproar of opposition from many ordinary Americans during the aborted bombing plans of a few weeks ago may well prove to have marked a watershed in the perception of decent people throughout this country about the situation in Iraq.

The vehemence of opposition expressed at Ohio State University and in teach-ins and marches around the nation shocked the government, and played a major role in stopping the attack. It demonstrated a growing public understanding that the people of this country do not stand to benefit from any further killing of Iraqis.

Moreover, the genocidal effects of the sanctions, which have been far more devastating to the Iraqi people than all the bombs of the Gulf War, are becoming more widely understood. As a result, grassroots efforts are emerging to provide food and medicine to the Iraqi people, from American citizens trying to staunch the flow of death that their own government has unleashed in their name.

Among the most important of these is the Iraq Sanctions Challenge Delegation. This large group of religious leaders, medical professionals and anti-war activists, led by former U.S. Attorney General Ramsey Clark and Bishop Thomas Gumbleton of Detroit, will travel to Iraq May 6–13, taking with them badly needed medical supplies.

Clark has explained the mission of the delegation saying, "The U.S./United Nations (U.N.) sanctions against Iraq have killed over 1.5 million people since their imposition. It's the clearest form of genocide and it's the U.S. government who insists upon the sanctions. It is incumbent upon us to challenge the sanctions and to bring medicine to the people of Iraq."

"This delegation represents the hundreds of thousands of people from across the country who oppose these devastating sanctions," adds Sara Flounders of the International Action Center (IAC), which is sponsoring the delegation.

A horrific crime against humanity, greater in scope than the other contemporary genocides in Rwanda and Bosnia, is being committed by your own government. As you read these words, the genocide in Iraq continues unabated. A little grassroots decency is long since past due.

The efforts to bring relief to Iraq are a marvelous opportunity to break the pervasive sense of impotence and irrelevance that so many people in this country feel when they look at a national politics, with all its corruption and immorality. There is a widespread sense that, with the incredible centralization of control over the political process and the mass media, individuals have little chance of raising a moral challenge to major policies, above all in international affairs.

But, as the people in Ohio proved, there are moments when it becomes possible for individuals to act in a powerful, effective and moral way, influencing even so-called "national security" issues. We couldn't all be in Ohio to tell Berger, Cohen and Albright that we repudiate their brutality, more's the pity. But we can all help those who are picking up where Ohio State left off.

The Iraq Sanctions Delegation Medical Aid Mission continues the challenge to these immoral policies by directly reaching out to those who are being victimized. That's what you do when never again is now.

Donations in any amount will be extremely helpful, and will undoubtedly help in saving lives, feeding the hungry and healing the sick. In the end, of course, there can be no substitute for lifting the sanctions. But, in the meanwhile, contributions to such grassroots efforts both help individual suffering Iraqis and send a clear message to the U.S. government and the Iraqi people that not everyone in the United States is willing to stand by as their government presides over a fully-fledged genocide.

The local effort in our area to raise funds and collect medicine to assist the IAC's Iraq Sanctions Delegation is being led by Martin Espada, Katherine Gilbert-Espada, Robby and Elli Meersypol, Arky and George Markham, Judy and John Edgar Wideman, Sunny Miller and Howard Zinn. Please join them in lending your support.

Those wishing to contribute may send checks made out to the People's Rights Fund/Medical Aid Project to International Action Center, PO Box 2733, Springfield, MA 01101.

Addicted to expletives

Who doesn't need a good, long f— every now and then?

The urge sneaks up on some at the close of the day, while others are the sort to need it in the morning just to get going. Regardless of when you find yourself ready to brim over with that desire, it happens for all of us.

I do it at least 20 times a day. Do you find this shocking?

I have friends who do it more. How does that sit with you?

People stuck in traffic jams may do it as many as 100 times per rush hour. Disgusting, right?

Wrong. Kindly remove your minds from the gutter — discussion of nymphomania or any such sordid practices will be restricted to my bedroom, say around midnight? The focus here is on profanity, specifically on the big-F.

How can anyone not dig the F-bomb? Most folks I know can't get through a shower and a shave without dropping one. You forget to bring a towel into the bathroom or slice yourself a tad and what other mot is more appropriately, ternely apt to sum up the situation. What sounds better to your ears: "Goshdarnit, It appears as though I have failed to consider the relative sensitivity of my face when compared to that of the blade" or "F— f—, F—."

There are many out there who consider swearing in all its vulgar glory the lowest of all expressive language — and sometimes they're right. Anyone who's ever slogged their way through a --crappy episode of "Def Comedy Jam" can attest to this. But at their best, pundits of the profane can spin poetry.

Martin Scorcese is a veritable demigod of all that can go right with naughty words. You could turn off the picture to Goodfellas and still have a masterpiece — a masterpiece peppered, salted and otherwise spicily sautéed with language to make nuns blush. Take away the objectionable phrases from the script and you have a confusingly irritable midget who probably deserves to get one in the back of the head, largely because nine-tenths of Joe Pesci's wonderfully perverse dialogue wouldn't make the cut.

If it were up to the holier-than-f—ing-thou legions of non- swearing citizens, Goodfellas might end up a disjointed five- minute short. The notion that profanity has no place in society can only come from some ancient Judeo-Christian thought that was probably outdated by the time of the Crucifixion. Does anyone in their right mind actually believe Jesus wasn't tossing a few profanities around after his buddies sold him out? I don't know about you, but I'd be one salty son of God.

Just you see if I die for your f—ing sins again!

Nowadays, in the A.P. (After Pryor) era, the use of profanity must indeed be accompanied by some sort of creative effort these days, as utterances like "motherf—er" and "f— you" have been largely exhausted by amateurs and professionals alike. In other words, if you really want the f- bombs to blow up proper, you have to pick a new angle of attack.

This is a challenging task to say the least. I mean, there are only so many different ways to get the same point across before it becomes a noticeably self-conscious effort. Everyone has their own little favorite constructions.

I, for instance, am prone to attaching the name of some random animal at the end of my f—s. There is little that makes me happier than receiving a disappointing grade and responding with a barely audible, "F—monkeys" or "F—llamas." It just works for me, don't ask why.

My housemate Albie, however, is more likely to dive headlong into a steady steam of swearing, his f—s popping their heads out of the flow of the rant like trout swimming upstream, a brutal, yet somehow natural process. He's from New Jersey, if that clears anything up.

Albie also possesses one other element that make some swearaholics' outbursts so memorable: a hair-trigger temper. You cut this kid off at an intersection and it's like listening to Lenny Bruce in a 'roid rage. Sometimes I find myself just kicking back on the couch, immersed in the wonderfully caustic melody of his inspired invective, sparked by something as seemingly trivial as a PlayStation loss. Sweet f—ing music.

The best of the profanity pundits are those whose cursing is unabrasive and subtle, a necessary component of their very manner of speech. We all know people like this, whether it be a friend, paramour, etc. And having hung around them for some time, we often fail to realize the genuine beauty of the way they have crafted a strangely inoffensive linguistic universe out of what some perceive to be a potty-mouth black hole.

I know of one such great example. Her name is Cecilia. For years, she'd would try her damnedest to avoid firing the occasional s-missile or b-bullet — or God forbid, an f-bomb — whenever I was in the room, since I was young and impressionable. But I'd hear her on the phone with her chums, making psychic sailors turn crimson in her waves of fluid, fluent cussing and I loved every word of it.

Yet, despite my admiration of her profanity prowess, I never felt comfortable releasing the f-hounds around her until I reached college. It was a magnificent experience, that dusk when I stubbed my toe on my desk and just let my soul go: "Ah, f—."

The subsequent apology was the most unneeded one I ever had to make to my mother.

Physics lesson #1

I almost bailed on the column this week, thinking after writing weekly since September, the ideas were coming slower and the brain just wasn't functioning at peak capacity. The truth is that I'm in the fatal throes of senioritis, which prevents me from accomplishing anything more productive than waking up in the morning.

Senioritis, for all you skeptics, is indeed a bona fide and debilitating condition, characterized by an extreme unwillingness to do anything worthwhile and a very low tolerance for stupidity.

Seema Gangatirkar

Not that I was ever the most patient and understanding person before I was stricken with senioritis, but now my tolerance for anything even remotely stupid is completely nil.

Stupidity, at times, reigns supreme on the UMass campus. I'm sure you can find stupidity on all campuses, but I'm thinking of one thing in specific: the current insanity of throwing things off the balconies in Orchard Hill.

Now, what's that all about? I mean, what possesses people to take a couch (not a small one either) and toss it off a balcony? Obviously, there isn't a rational thought involved in such an action, but someone somewhere seems to be able to justify it.

I'm sure that some well-meaning individual (while under the influence, of course, as personal responsibility cannot be a factor here) wandered onto the balcony one night and said, "Hey, this is a couch. No one could possibly want to sit on it."

Hence, the highly intoxicated individual runs off and grabs a couple of his equally drunk friends and the three of them heave up the offending piece of furniture and hurl it off the balcony (now, I'm not suggesting anything by using the male pronoun. I'm sure that there are just as many females launching objects off balconies).

Now, while personally I'm not sure what the thrill is in throwing University property out of windows and off balconies, there must be something in it.

Perhaps it started off as an investigation into the phenomenon of gravity.

Idiot number one: "Oh look, Joe. If I drop this desk off the seventh floor, it falls."

Idiot number two: "Wow. Cool. Let's do it again."

Sorry, fellows. Isaac Newton already beat you to the punch. If you drop it, It will fall.

Now, forget for a moment that if you're dropping things off balconies, the things usually shatter and that's the end of that wonderful couch people could have (gasp!) used to sit on!

Instead, consider the poor individual walking below who now also has to check whether or not the forecast indicates rain or snow, but also whether there's a chance of couch flurries, desk storms or a gust of fire extinguisher.

I'm sure all of you who indulge in the All-American sport of catapulting University property to the ground below are protecting yourself properly with helmets, mouth-guards and shin guards. But for those students who are wandering around, utterly unaware of what's going on above them, it poses a tricky situation. Does one watch the ground, to avoid tripping over the remains of a couch, or watch the sky above in case someone gets it into their mind to drop something down. Will Miss Manners please advise on the proper etiquette?

And of course, there is this whole issue of the lounges being locked, cut-off or being otherwise unusable. An action which, in theory, will prevent such unsanctioned use of furniture. Of course, closing off the lounges also means those people who might actually want to use the space for something productive will not be able to.

But those are the trade-offs, you know? Throwing stuff off balconies automatically means the balconies are off-limits. Sounds a little like kindergarten when Buck punched Beau in the nose for no reason (again, personal responsibility not an issue) and both kids had to sit in the corner and reflect for hours on what they did wrong.

But at least in kindergarten, you had the excuse of being a 5-year-old. What's the excuse now?

So I propose an easy solution in order to end this current stupidity: get rid of all the furniture.

Wahlberg's latest no Hit

THE BIG HIT
Directed by Che-Kirk Wong with Mark Wahlberg, Lou Diamond Phillips and Christina Applegate
Playing at Mountain Farms Theaters

If you've seen the commercial preview for The Big Hit, stop right there — you've seen enough. During stunts like Mark Wahlberg bungee-jumping from an exploding building won't get any better than that. Jokes like "What are you [f—]ing? The Spice Boys or somethin'?" are abundant. The Big Hit is an action movie, but for some reason, there's only two action scenes.

That's because writer Ben Ramsey and company try to make The Big Hit into a hip comedy as well; sometimes it works, most often it doesn't. One thing that falls disgustingly flat is jokes revolving around Jewish stereotypes, which basically sums up the whole movie. It's overkill — video store rental garbage that's coated with good-looking actors and a flashy budget.

The Hong Kong influence is evident here: the executive producer is John Woo, the Orson Welles of the action flick. Unfortunately, executive producer means "I put my name on it so it will make money."

The director instead is a guy named Che-Kirk Wong, apparently a celebrated filmmaker in his native land, but here he directs with all the finesse of a Jackie Chan movie. One problem — no Jackie Chan. All we get is incredible overacting, strange humor and some ridiculously implausible [illegible]. Luckily, The Big Hit doesn't take itself too seriously. It's all wrapped in tongue-in-cheek cheesiness that partly makes fun of hit-man movies, partly revels In their coolness. Sure, the film is occasionally adrenaline-pumping, but most of the time, it's just amusingly strange.

The plot: A kidnapping. That's all you need to know.

Better that I talk about the "characters." Wahlberg, a good actor and the only "normal" thing in this movie, plays a nice-guy hitman who wants everyone to like him. He has fiancée Christina Applegate fake an accent even Kevin Costner would laugh at. And there is Wahlberg's pal Lou Diamond Phillips, a long way from "The King and I" on Broadway (although with his overdone mannerisms and colorful costumes, he apparently thinks he's still on stage).

It's too bad, because The Big Hit had the potential to be a much better film. It's surprisingly witty at times and in some very select moments, genuinely funny. But the rest is downright [illegible] movie clichés filtered at super high-speed, in annoyingly music-video style. "Look Ma, I can play with a camera!" No one in this movie, however, could pass first grade.

The film's ending is a chase and shoot-em-up that stretches the limits of ridiculousness even further. And in case you think the villian is dead, director Wong is quick to bring out the instant replay and show you, somehow, that he escaped. The silliness here makes John Woo's own Face/Off worthy of an Oscar. D+

Trax On Trax Off

From the first twang of the guitar on "The Fundamental Things," Bonnie Raitt sets the tone for the rest of her latest album, Fundamental. With her 15th album under her belt, Raitt stretches out into blues, reggae, soul and rock.

"The Fundamental Things" is a richer, funkier song than usual from Raitt, complete with lots of guitar and dry vocals. The guitar twang, which seems to be a redundant theme on this album, is featured prominently on the sultry "Cure for Love." Raitt's vocals wrap seductively around the lyrics, but the overall flow is interrupted by an annoying "La, la, la, la," which seems to go on forever. "Round & Round" features Raitt sounding faraway on the J.B. Lenoir classic and, once again, the song would do well, if it weren't for the prominence of Raitt's back-up singers, who intrude at the most inopportune moment with "Round and round, up and down."

"Spit of Love" features a fuller and eerier sound — a perfect complement for Raitt's rather disturbing lyrics of "There's howlin' at my window, baby/ I hear him closin' in/ That green-eyed jacka's got the scent."

The slower "Lover's Will," features Raitt softer and gentler than she has been on the earlier tracks. Even the lyrics are more pensive and wistful, like "Who'll take the only hearts they got/ and throw them into the fire." Raitt is at her best on "Lover's Will," making full use of her rich voice and a softer accompaniment. "Blue For No Reason" brings the guitars back along with Raitt's trademark twang.

In all, Fundamental is a fresh, fun album, with a lot of spirit. And in making this album, Raitt has managed to combine many different approaches to create a sound that is uniquely hers. B (Seema Gangatirkar)

From the lively fiddle on Dance of the Celts to the sweet songs of love on Heart of the Celts to the passion of Turlough O'Carolan on Celtic Treasure, Narada has assembled a collection of Celtic music showcasing the very best of modern Celtic musicians.

Dance of the Celts begins with a medley of three Scots jigs, both infectious and spontaneous in spirit. Along with the fiddle, the jigs include the cittern, flute, percussion and guitar in a foot-stomping interpretation. On the second track, Anna Mhoireach shows off her skills on both highland (mouth-blown) and small (bellows-blown) pipes on three reels. The sweeter sound of the pipes are highlighted by the complimenting cittern, accordion, guitar, tin whistle and harp. Kevin Crawford's interpretation of "Christy Barry" is both sweet and lively, highlighting his prowess on the tin whistle and bohdran.

The pace picks up with Dervish's rendition of three dance reels while world-renowned composer John Whelan performs his own creation, "Trip to Skye." "Trip to Skye" is a beautiful, melancholy melody, inspired by the scenic splendor of the Island of Skye. With a delicate melody on the violin, the composition also includes an electro-acoustic guitar and synthesizer to add a more lush and modern feeling. That peaceful feeling is followed up by Kormog's interpretation of three gavottes. Skillfully blending deft guitar picking in a seductive first act, the composition begins to pick up the intensity of the tempo, until a full-fledged dance rhythm has evolved.

Altan performs a spontaneous and infectious medley of Irish dances, followed by Mary Bergin's virtuosity on the tin whistle. Dance of the Celts closes off with a track from Declan Masterson, a native of Dublin. Masterson interprets three traditional jigs in a stately, but elegant fashion.

For a change of pace, the sweeter and more mellow Heart of the Celts offers love songs in both English and Celtic, from some of the best singers in Ireland today. With the first track, Karen Matheson pours her passion of "When You Return," and then follows that up with the more subdued and plaintive "Mi le M' uilinn Air Mo Ghulin, (With My Elbow My Knee)."

But love is not all subdued and longing, and the joy of freedom comes out in "Anaact na nAnaacht (My Love and My Delight)" performed by Aoife Ni Fhearraigh. Arkansas native Connie Dover is next with the melancholy "Somebody" while Maigbread Ni Dhomhnaill leaves behind instrumentation and instead relies on her sinewy voice for "An Clar Bog Deal (The Board of Bog-Oak)." Once again, Fhearraigh returns with "Caitlin Triall (Caitlin of the Tresses)," another upbeat, happy melody. Dover performs "Laddie, Lie Near Me" delicately and tenderly, making full use of her extensive vocal range.

Heart of the Celts closes with Fhearraigh's soft rendition of "Cailin na Gruiage Baine (The Girl with the Fair Hair)." Her voice resonates over the soft accompaniment, giving the tune a gentle and ethereal quality.

Moving on, Celtic Treasure celebrates one of the greatest Celtic composers — Turlough O'Carolan. O'Carolan lived during the Baroque period, counting as his contemporaries the likes of Handel, Vivaldi, Purcell and Bach. O'Carolan lacked formal musical education, but his compositions were influenced greatly by Italian Baroque composers like Vivaldi, Corelli and Geminiani. But O'Carolan did not ignore his own heritage and he drew on the wealth of dance music, marches, airs and laments for his compositions. Celtic Treasure begins with "Planty Burke/Planty Drew," performed by Shelley Phillips. With Phillips on harp, oboe and English horn, the tune shows off O'Carolan's imagination and freshness in his music. The elegant but staid "Squire Parsons" features James Betagh on oboe while Deanta melds harp, fiddle and flue through the wistful "Eleanor Plunkett."

The traditional dance rhythm is revisited in Deiseal's rendition of "Lord Inchiquin," while Ann Heyman's "The Hawk of Ballyshannon" spotlights the harp strung with brass wire. These are just three of the highlights in Narada's extensive Celtic music collection, all featuring some of the very best of modern day Celtic musicians, interpreting tradition in a modern fashion. Dance of the Celts, B; Celtic Treasure, B+; Heart of the Celts, B (S.G.)

BULLWORTH THE SOUNDTRACK
Various Artists
Interscope

How many times have you heard that there was a hip-hop soundtrack coming out that was going to change the world? Probably about every time a new soundtrack comes out. How many times does a soundtrack provide little more then a couple of really hot singles and a lot of filler that makes you jump up and hit the foward button because you're embarrassed someone might hear what you are listening to? Also probably every time a soundtrack comes out. Well, there's definitely some doo-doo on Bullworth, but the hot tracks are so hot.

Ignore the opening song "Zoom" with Dr. Dre and LL Cool J — it's corny and annoying and makes you long for the days when they weren't into releasing commercial singles. Then put on your dancing shoes for "Ghetto Superstar (That Is What You Are)" with Ol' Dirty Bastard, Pras Michael and Mya — it's strictly a butterfried summer thing. "How Come" by Cannibus and Youssou N'Dour will make you question the politics of this nation. Then you have the title track "Bullworth" with Method Man, KRS-One, Prodigy and KAM that will make your blood boil and your fists pump. Right now you are in a state of hip-hop ecstasy and thanking G-d for this album.

"The Chase" by the RZA shows why he is the key member of the Wu and "Joints and Jams" introduces us to Black Eyed Peas, who are contending for rookie of the year honors. You also have "Holiday/12 Scanner" by Witchdoctor and "Run" by Cappadonna, two previously released tracks. "Eve of Destruction" showcases Eve, who might be one of better female MCs around today, slamming beat also.

The fall-off comes with "Maniac in the Brainiac" by Mack 10 and Ice Cube, a disappointing track for such veterans. "Lunatics in the Grass" by B Real is weak and "Bitches Are Hustlers Too" by D-Fyne demonstrates everything that is wrong with the West coast.

The saving grace is "Kill Em Live" by Public Enemy. They're back, they're pissed and it's about time. A nation of millions couldn't hold them back and neither can a layoff of a couple of years. Chuck D never sounded better, and, on an album stocked with jewels he provides the muscle. B+ (Adam Dhugacz)

ESPN PRESENTS: MUSIC FROM THE X-GAMES, VOLUME 3
Various Artists
Mammoth

I don't need the X-Games. I don't need Surge and it's stupid commercials. I don't need Pepsi and Generation Next. I am sick of corporate America trying to sell extreme sports and its participants as the paradigm for the generation. Mountain Dew can take its bungee jumping, screaming, flannel wearing minnies and kiss my curvy white butt, to quote Homer Simpson.

What I especially don't need is a soundtrack to the stupidity. This album captures your favorite one-hit wonders at their prime and inexplicably mixes in some good bands. It makes for a strange mix that sits as well as two-day-old southern fried steak (yee-ha!).

Do I need Days of the New? No. I didn't need Alice in Chains, so logic follows that I don't want to listen to their evil twin. 311? Didn't those guys die? I need to hear more from them like I need another autobiography from William Bulger.

On the other side, we have tracks from Mighty Mighty Bosstones and the Descendants, but both of the songs are on their latest releases. So why bother? Who came up with the idea to put "The Impression That I Get" on the album? Did they think some wanna-be extremist was thinking "Hey, I'm not going to buy the whole Bosstones album, but if they put it on a collection with some really bad fake metal, like Coal Chamber, then sign me up!" If you buy this album, you're probably already waiting in line for Meet the Deedles 2. Chump.

This album sucks and is a waste of time and our earthly resources. The person who came up with the idea for it, much less let it last for three volumes should be brought up on terrorism charges. F (Mike Messaros)

MY WAY OR THE HIGHWAY
Tuscadero
TeenBeat

There's something about girl-pop that I'm a sucker for. At the same time, there's only so much I can take. Tuscadero represents perfectly what can be so wrong and so right with the genre.

The best example of what Tuscadero tries to achieve here is that dog's Retreat From the Sun. That album is washed over in two- and three-part harmonies and shimmering guitar parts. Best of all it's only a little over a half an hour long. My Way or the Highway falls short of that high water mark. The album certainly has its moments, but the unevenness and pure suckiness of some tracks does it in. Plus, at over 50 minutes long, you get mired in sticky sweet girl-pop.

The album starts off with "Queen For A Day," which does rock. The follow-up track, though, "Paper Dolls," drops the ball. It's way too long and has little substance to keep it rolling along.

Other songs that do carry on in greatness are "Dr. Doom" and "Not My Johnny." "Dr. Doom" in particular, plays like the title track to an unmade James Bond movie. At one point, the music descends into a Bondsian bridge, complete with blaring, sexy horns, but then rips into a rockin' part. The change over is unexpected and well done. B+ (M.M.)

and saw action in all 13. Since her arrival at UMass, Leder has been among the team leaders in groundballs, offering key defensive and transitional play from the midfield and defender positions.

After Herker returned to the playing field following her devastating injury, she proceeded to play in 38 of 40 games, while showing no signs of favoring her repaired leg. Out of the seniors graduating, she put the most balls in the back of the cage during the recent 9–5 season, with 16 goals and more than 20 points. Like her classmates, Herker's play was never limited to one dimension. Her groundball total was always respectable, and opposing teams could not come into a game against the Minutewomen without giving No. 13's speed and all-around play serious consideration.

Bowen's role on the team could be very easily described as that of the field general. Her 42 goals over four years is the highest total of the three, but her real strength came in her offensive leadership. Bowen could be found spending her senior season planted behind the enemy goal with the ball, directing her teammates and setting up the most optimal chance the group had for scoring each trip down the field. Her selfless play allowed others to put points on the board, as she realized the benefit of running the offensive system correctly and patiently.

"Together, they worked to create a strong and respectable Massachusetts women's lacrosse team for years to come, and without their dedication since 1994, there's no telling how much longer it would have taken for the squad to reach the point that they are currently at.

"They cared very much about the program and how our program does," McClellan said. "They set the standard for the younger kids, and have taken their roles seriously. I couldn't ask for better leadership."

"It's sad leaving after seeing what this year was like," Herker said. "I wish all four years were like this. When we came in our freshman year we just didn't have it together. We were freshmen; I don't even know if we had a sight on what was going on.

"Then our sophomore and junior years we saw our team more talented and we played more as a team each year. Of course, our sophomore year we only won one more game, so our record didn't really show it, but this is the year that our team finally knows how to win. There's no real dominating player. Everybody's the heart of this team."

BRIAN MCDERMOTT / COLLEGIAN

Coming down the home stretch

Massachusetts baseball coach Mike Stone will lead his squad into a three-game set with Atlantic 10 rival St. Bonaventure this weekend in Olean, NY.

■ tennis

"The improvement over the four years here for me has been unbelievable," Gorodetskaya said. "Our attitudes and playing abilities have gone through so much growth to the point where we are almost expected to beat the good teams."

With the joy of a successful season comes the pain of moving on, and leaving the team behind just when things are getting rolling.

"I have been playing the best tennis of my life lately," Caron said. "It is going to be so hard to stop playing now, when I know I can help the team get even better."

"It's a shame that the season had to end now. We always seem to play our best tennis at the end of the season," Steele said. "I feel fortunate to have been able to go to school and play tennis here."

Dixon has stressed all season that the only way to better the program is to put more pressure on the players to perform against the better players in the nation.

The only hurdle that will have to be overcome is the loss of Gorodetskaya, Caron and Steele, all of whom have been instrumental in getting the Minutewomen to this level in the first place.

JOMMA KANSANEN / COLLEGIAN

Mowing down the opposition

UMass pitcher Danielle Henderson, the nation's leader in strikeouts-per-game, fanned 11 Boston College hitters in a 1-0 win over the Eagles yesterday afternoon in Chestnut Hill.

Minutewomen fall to Terriers, 8–7

By Jamie Jee
Collegian Staff

Unfortunately, all good things must come to an end.

But boy was it good.

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team ended its season yesterday at Totman Field and although its 8–7 loss to Boston University caused many teary eyes, the Terriers could not take away what the Minutewomen had already accomplished and gone through together.

"I thought that everyone was in a really confident and good place and everyone really had high hopes," Massachusetts coach Francesca McClellan said. "It's tough for everybody because everyone has worked hard."

UMass (9–5) continued to show its resiliency under pressure in the defeat, coming back after BU (8–7) managed to stay two goals ahead for most of the first half. The Terriers avoided an early deficit after they stopped junior attack Laura Koruzo on consecutive opportunities.

BU junior attack Chris Sison finally started the scoring with less than five minutes gone in the game, receiving the pass from sophomore attack Lisa Sorelle.

From that point on, it was the BU team leaders that dominated the game, including freshman Chrissy Lombardi, who led all players with three goals. The Terriers' leading scorer, Jen Manning also contributed, as she joined Sison with two goals apiece.

"I think that the irony of this game was that our theme for the year was learning how to win games," McClellan said. "We just had trouble putting it to use in this game."

Down 2-0, the Minutewomen refused to fold, as sophomore midfielder Stephanie Pavlick answered with a score at the 19:23 mark. Pavlick found herself alone at the top of the circle and took advantage of the opportunity.

"I think the kids fought hard today," McClellan said. "I think that there was no doubt that the fourth game in seven days really took its toll."

BU continued to threaten in an effort to scrap its way to a win, but senior midfielder Amy Leder and sophomore defenseman Lynne Young played tenacious defense and held Manning in check for most of the contest.

"Everyone had high hopes for ECACs," Leder said. "We've beaten BU every year and this is our strongest year. We were unable to come through with it. It was just a major upset."

Terriers freshman midfielder Kyle Rutkowski would continue to work the ball around well and eventually found Lombard with the first of her two assists at 17:39.

UMass' senior leadership refused to be suppressed though, as midfielder Jen Herker quickly pushed it up the field to find captain Jen Bowen streaking down the sideline. Herker fired a crisp pass to set up Bowen for the score only 38 seconds after Lombard's.

Both teams then used their solid defensive abilities for several minutes, as the Terriers played with reckless abandon, freely swinging their sticks and checking at will. They found little protest from the officials, who let much of the physical play go. The Minutewomen routinely used their speed to escape the BU defenders, but UMass seemed out of sync early.

"We stuck together and played hard, we were just messing up the little things like dropping the ball," Leder said.

Lombard would eventually notch her second goal on the day to push BU's lead back to two. A Terrier infraction led to junior midfielder Melissa Anderson's goal with nine seconds remaining in the first half after Herker evaded two defenders to make the pass.

The teams alternated goals to start the half and Herker made it 6–6 when she responded to Lombard's goal with an expedient answer at 16:07. Jen Nardi followed with an excellent save on a penalty shot by Sorelle and Pavlick broke through to put the Minutewomen up, 7–6.

BU junior midfield captain Jean Cooney aggressively took the following drop, however, charging in to tie the game, setting up Lombard for the game winner with 2:02 remaining.

"[I'm] thrilled with our season," McClellan said. "We had a really great year. For a lot of reasons, a lot of youngsters really stepped up over the year. It just portends great things for the future and think that we really evolved as a team tremendously."

Minutewoman seniors helped pave way for future of UM lax

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

Although the loss to Boston University yesterday ended the season in a heartbreaking fashion, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team has posted its best record since 1987, with a 9–5 mark.

In the fall of 1994, a 9–5 record would not have been fathomed by the Minutewomen and their coaching staff, as Francesca McClellan was only in her second year in a house-cleaning, rebuilding process with the squad.

The hopes for the future were high, however, as the freshman class of that year boasted 10 talented players that were almost sure shots to lead the team back to the promised land of the upper echelon of NCAA women's lacrosse teams, where the program was in the early 1980's when it brought home the University's only national championship in school history.

As the time passed, though, just like in the Agatha Christie classic novel, the 10 "little freshmen" dropped off of the roster one by one.

At the end of the 1995 season, UMass was left with a 3–10 record — the second of three consecutive years with double digits in the loss column. The once storied program had suffered greatly recently, beginning in 1989, when the team followed up an ECAC runner-up finish with a disappointing 2–11 mark. In 1991 and 1992, the University went so far as to eliminate the varsity sport. Once reinstated for the 1993 season, the Minutewomen did not win a game.

Losing big-name, proven recruits was probably starting to seem like just the tip of the iceberg to McClellan, who was brought in from Yale to resurrect the Massachusetts legacy.

Before long, the promising class of 1998 diminished to only three — Jen Bowen, Jen Herker and Amy Leder.

"There was a bunch of them when they started, and then only those three are remaining," sophomore Noelle Gorski said. "They're good leaders. They've been through a lot, and they've seen everything."

"There were a lot of ups and downs, and that's what I don't think a lot of people who came out our freshman year could handle," Herker said. "We could handle it, and we stuck around. It was more of a mentality thing our freshman year that they couldn't handle. We stuck with it. We all had something to prove, I think."

Out of the 10 that began, few people might have expected those three particular players to be the ones that made it to their senior year, because the hurdles for those three to overcome were steeper than normal.

"I redshirted my first year for an ACL tear," Herker said. "I think that's an issue when people say they didn't think I'd be one of the last ones to be here. I didn't even think I was going to come back, but I stuck with it, and I'm here."

"I couldn't catch a ball, basically, when I came in," Leder said. "I pretty much had to re-try out my freshman year. Coach said she wasn't sure if I was team material."

"This senior class has a place in my heart because this senior class was sort of like survival of the fittest," McClellan said. "Amy Leder was a walk-on, Jen Herker was pretty close to a walk-on. Bowen came in and we knew about her, but these kids came in and over the course of four years became the best players they could be. They got the most out of themselves. They always worked hard — right up until yesterday's practice they worked hard."

"Our freshman year, something new would always come up, so we had to prove ourselves then," Bowen said. "Our sophomore and junior years they recruited really good classes, so we had to prove ourselves every year, really."

Leder, Herker and Bowen have all added very different, yet crucial parts of what has brought this team to that aforementioned upper echelon of NCAA women's lacrosse teams over their four years here — without the other seven players that entered UMass in their class.

Leder, despite her relatively small size, is the feisty one of the trio; the sparkplug for a smoothly running engine. No. 14 could always be seen representing her teammates with her physical, aggressive play, often taking on significantly larger opponents, recalling the old tale of David and Goliath. Her stick skills and catching quickly improved, and before her freshman campaign was over, her dependability was no longer suspect, as she started nine games

Surprises aplenty as the first round winds down

Who would have thought that the Ottawa Senators and Phoenix Coyotes would be giving the Devils and Red Wings a run for their money in the first round of the NHL playoffs?

Not I, for one.

It seemed too far-fetched at first, having two of the legitimate threats to take this year's Stanley Cup home, trailing as we cross the midway point in these series. However, it's a reality for two of the league's elite.

I will, however, take credit for picking Buffalo to d o w n Philadelphia. No, they haven't won anything yet, and yes, I will take the heat if they lose the series. However, I'm sitting pretty right n o w.

Michael Kobylanski on the NHL

Eastern Conference

• The Senators have gotten great goaltending and have caught a few breaks in order to find themselves in the position that they are in right now. It's not that the Devils are playing terrible, either, or have underestimated the Senators. Ottawa is sticking with the big boys, and may just end up in the second round.

• Let's give it up for the Sabres. Not because they're winning in the series, either, but because they scored six goals in game three the other night. Dominik Hasek has been his usual self, and the potent Philadelphia offensive attack has been held in check. Expect the duo of Eric Lindros and John LeClair to attempt to mount a comeback effort, but one that will still fall short in the end.

• I'm sure that all of the Bruins fans out there have been waiting for this. Yes, the B's should be up 2–1, but a shady call has them in a one game hole. Sure, maybe Tim Taylor's skate was in the crease by a couple of centimeters, but it had no bearing on whether or not _J. Axelsson's shot was going to find the back of the net.

Everybody knows that the Black and Gold will be heading into game four with the lead. Even Capitals coach Ron Wilson agrees with that.

Oh, how hockey can be a game of inches. Just ask the Boston College hockey team about that.

• Montreal has jumped out to a 2–1 lead over the Penguins. This one has the makings of a classic matchup, one that could go to seven games. I know that I chose the Pens last week, and I'm not going to change that now, but I wouldn't be surprised if the Habs come out winners in this one.

Western Conference

• Like I mentioned in the opening, Phoenix appears to be giving the Wings more than they bargained for. Guys like Jeremy Roenick and Keith Tkachuk both have playoff experience and can help to push Detroit out of the hunt for the Cup. But we always have to remember who the champs are now, and until someone else proves otherwise, Detroit is still one of the favorites. Expect this one to go seven games.

• St. Louis pulled game three of their series with the Kings out of their, well you know, the other night. Now it's pretty clear why I couldn't pick a winner in this one. A dumb L.A. penalty gives the Blues a five-minute power play, and a 3–0 third period Kings lead turns into a 4–3 St. Louis win.

And while I'm talking about that comeback, I have to applaud former Whaler Terry Yake for netting the game winner. I have to be honest with you, I didn't even know that this guy was still playing until I saw those highlights the other night. Another great front office move by the Whalers/Hurricanes. And you wonder why they never make the playoffs.

• Dallas seemed to be on their way to a four-game sweep until San Jose decided to prove otherwise in game three. But don't send the Sharks to next round just yet. This one should be over in five games. There will be no miracles in California this year.

• And finally, there is the Edmonton/Colorado series. The Oilers showed that they weren't going to lie dead in this one by taking game one of the series and going to overtime with the Avalanche in game three. Edmonton looks like they're going to make this one interesting, but game six will probably be the end of the line for the Oilers.

Hey, you really can't be shocked with the way things are going. After all, there's a reason why they play the games. You call them upsets. And there may be some doozies in this opening round.

Seniors leave with BU loss

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's tennis team completed the season by splitting two matches, but the program is clearly in a strong position for next season.

With the split, UMass finished the 1997–98 campaign at 14–12.

They posted the mark this season despite playing against a vastly improved array of opponents, including the likes of Ivy League powerhouses Yale and Princeton.

The only damper on the heightened spirits of the team revolve around the loss of three key team members.

Seniors Marie-Christine Caron, Lana Gorodetskaya and Caroline Steele concluded their UMass careers during a loss to Boston University last Wednesday.

Before the Atlantic 10 tournament earlier this month, Massachusetts coach Judy Dixon addressed the disappointment.

"We will be losing three very competitive tennis players in Lana, Marie and Caroline," Dixon said. "They were great players and great people to coach as well."

The Minutewomen started last week on a high, smashing Fairfield 5–2 at home.

Ola Gerasimova led the way by defeating Lenka Hurton, 6–4, 6–1. Caron was impressive at No. 2 knocking off Mary Liz Fitzpatrick, 6–2, 6–4, but Gorodetskaya fell to Liz Steege, 5–7, 2–6.

Steele teamed up with Jackie Braunstein at No. 2 doubles to pull out an 8–2 win over Fitzpatrick and Deidre Tindall.

That set the stage for an emotional Senior Day at the Upper Boyden courts against local rival BU.

Unfortunately for UMass, after the festivities were over, the team fell meakly 7–0 to the Lady Terriers. However, the loss did not take away from the many achievements the team earned throughout the past season.

All three seniors dropped their final collegiate matches, as the team clearly suffered a post-Atlantic 10 tournament let- down.

"It was a great four years, and an amazing season," Gorodetskaya said. "Each year had their special moments, but finishing second at the A-10 tournament was very special for all of us."

The program at UMass has come into its own, with the current seniors laying the groundwork for the success. The Minutewomen have compiled a terrific 43–20 record over the past three seasons.

Softball sweeps Eagles; baseball downs UVM

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

Simply stated, it was a productive afternoon yesterday for both the Massachusetts softball and baseball teams.

The Minutewomen edged out regional rival Boston College by scores of 1–0 and 2–1. The Minutemen, on the other hand, rallied from a 10–7 deficit to defeat the University of Vermont by a 15–11 tally.

Henderson, Wagner, lead way for UM softball

UMass took game one of its double dip with BC by a 1–0 score. Junior hurler Danielle Henderson tossed a three-hitter while striking out 11 to earn her 22nd win of the season.

The Minutewomen (36–12) scored their run in game one in the third inning. Mandy Galas opened the inning with a walk, then stole second base and moved to third on a passed ball before Tracey Osier drove her in with an RBI single.

Liz Wagner came back with a two-hitter in game two, a contest which UMass won in 10 innings. Kim Gutridge was the heroine in this one, hitting her first home run of the year in the top of the 10th to put UMass over the top.

The Minutewomen will next hit the diamond this weekend when they will travel to Kingston, R.I. for the Atlantic 10 tournament.

Minutemen win slugfest with Vermont

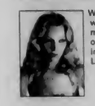
The potent offensive attack of the Massachusetts baseball team once again propelled the Minutemen to victory on Tuesday afternoon in Burlington, Vt.

Trailing 10–9 in the top of the seventh, the visitors erupted for four runs to take a 13–10 lead. Pete Gautreau, who had a 4–for–6 afternoon with four runs scored and three RBI, delivered the big blow in the inning when he belted his ninth home run of the year.

Nicole Faessler

Doug Clark

Steve Asadoorian had a 5–for–6 day at the plate for UMass, while Matt Wolcott added three hits. Machie Dagliere went 2–for–5 and with an RBI single in the third inning became the UMass career leader in that category. Nick Gorneault also had two hits from the leadoff spot.



Freshman Craig Szado tossed three innings of one–hit relief to earn his first collegiate win, while Ryan Cameron pitched the final two and one–third scoreless innings to record the save.

The Minutemen will next be in action this weekend when they will travel to Olean, NY for a three–game series with St. Bonaventure.

Catholic bishop slain over report on abuse

GUATEMALA CITY (AP) — As somber church bells rang out, 10,000 Guatemalans carrying blood-red camations of protest bade farewell yesterday to a Roman Catholic bishop slain after publishing a report on army abuses.

The death of Bishop Juan Gerardi Conedera, whose head was bashed in Sunday night with a concrete block, sparked fears that the violence of Guatemala's past has not ended.

"He fought for reconciliation, for authentic peace... for peace founded in justice and truth," said Bishop Gerardo Flores of the northern region of Veracruz, where Gerardi once ministered to impoverished Indian peasants. "That is why they wanted to silence his voice."

After lying in state for three days in the Metropolitan Cathedral, the bishop's body was carried through the streets of the capital by white-robed priests, who bore his casket on their shoulders. His casket was then placed in one of the cathedral's crypts.

While a motive for the slaying remained unclear, many believe that the prelate was killed to warn others not to delve into past atrocities by the military, whom the report blamed for nearly 80 percent of the 200,000 killings or disappearances during the country's 36-year civil war.

Astronauts perform surgery on baby rats

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. (AP) — Two doctors aboard space shuttle Columbia cut into the legs of six anesthetized baby rats yesterday as part of a study of how nerves develop in weightlessness. It was the first surgery ever performed in space on creatures meant to survive. Previously, astronauts merely dissected dead animals.

The astronauts would have operated on one or two more rats if not for the surprisingly high mortality rate among the rodents aboard the shuttle.

The death count rose yesterday to 51 — more than half of the 96 baby rats launched aboard Columbia two weeks ago. The cause of death: low blood sugar, low body temperature and dehydration, all due to maternal neglect.

Because of the dwindling pool of young rodents, crewmen Jay Buckey Jr. and Dave Williams picked six of the fittest animals for leg surgery.

The men made a small incision in both hind legs, injected a fluorescent dye, then sealed the wounds using surgical glue. "Everything went well," Buckey reported. "All six rats have recovered."

The rats will be killed and dissected by the astronauts tomorrow. The fluorescent dye injected into the animals' muscles will have spread by then to their spinal cords, allowing researchers to see how muscles and nerves develop in weightlessness.

Miyoshi speech details Nike's alleged abuses

By Jason Eiseman
Collegian Staff

Nike is guilty of exploiting it's workers with sweatshop conditions in their factories in Asia according to Kim Miyoshi, an organizer for the group Global Exchange. Approximately 100 people heard her speak about the abuses of Nike in the Campus Center Tuesday night.

Global Exchange is a non-profit organization, with the goal of advocating and working for political, economic and social justice around the world.

Miyoshi works in Global Exchange's corporate accountability program, designed to pressure companies to raise wages and improve factory conditions around the world.

"The workers need the job, they don't need to be exploited in the process," Miyoshi said.

Miyoshi said the majority of Nike's factories are in Vietnam, Indonesia, and China. She said countries like these lower minimum wages to entice companies to do business there, and Nike still petitions these countries so they can pay workers below the minimum wage.

Miyoshi said in Vietnam most workers were suffering from health problems because the toxins in the factories were 177 times the Vietnamese legal limit. She said in April, 1997 Vietnamese workers had to go on strike to earn a one cent per hour raise.

"Their goal in life was to be 'fitted'," she said. "They said they've been liberated from the ghetto when they step out in their gear."

Charges of theft, tampering brought against Pellegrino

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

Charges of theft and tampering in a Student Union office were filed this week with the Dean of Students against Amy Pellegrino, candidate for Student Government Association (SGA) president, by her opponent Salwa Shamapande and trustee candidate Eleanor Court.

Shamapande and Court filed a petition with the SGA elections commission Tuesday regarding Pellegrino's presence in the office of the Radical Student Union (RSU), their campaign headquarters, on Saturday.

The petition charged Pellegrino with theft and tampering with University of Massachusetts property.

The elections commission held a meeting Tuesday night to discuss the charges, however Shamapande and Court withdrew the petition and filed it with the Dean of Students because the charges against Pellegrino violated the University's Code of Student of Conduct.

"We didn't want to deny any student their right to due process so we filed the petition with the Dean of Students office pending an investigation," Court said.

The election commission discussed the petition but did not take action because the petition was withdrawn.

"It was discussed, and there were no motions made because it was withdrawn," Chancellor of Elections Seth Presner said.

Bron Tamulis, an SGA senator and eye witness to the incident, said he saw Pellegrino and others in the RSU on Saturday.

"I went down to the LBGA [Lesbian Bisexual Gay Alliance, which shares a hallway with the RSU] and I found sitting in the RSU office Ed Cutting, Amy [Pellegrino] and Ashavan [Doyon]," Tamulis said.

"The RSU has been the campaign headquarters of the Shamapande/Court campaign and none of these people were in the RSU," Tamulis said.

Pellegrino said she was in the office waiting for keys to get into another office in the Student Union.

"I was trying to get the keys to another office and Ashavan said he had a key to the Lesbian Bisexual Gay Alliance and we could wait there," Pellegrino said.

Tamulis said he left and when he returned, he noticed a box containing campaign material that was not in the office before.

"When I came back, the box was on the couch with Ed Cutting's backpack in it," Tamulis said.

Pellegrino said she did not see any campaign material.

"I didn't see any kind of campaign material," Pellegrino said. If Bron was so concerned about us being there that it warranted a petition to the commission, then why didn't he say anything to us when he came in. Why didn't he call the police right there?"

University police are investigating allegations against Doyon, but refused comment Monday on this ongoing matter.

"The part that says alcohol education [on the chart] after a first offense would be a one shot deal. To show the physiological effects of alcohol as well as other problems alcohol causes. We want it to be more interactive. It won't be like a one or two hour class in lecture format," Thompson said.

SGA hears recommended alcohol policy changes

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

Recommended changes in the alcohol policy were announced at the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) meeting last night.

Dawn Thompson, Associate Director of Housing Services Residential Life, and Paul Vasconcellos, Assistant Dean of Students, announced the changes as well as presented the senate with a chart of reprimands given regarding student's use of alcohol.

The chart lists four different offenses regarding alcohol. Underage consumption of alcohol, open container in public space, possession of keg or large volume of alcohol and dispensing alcohol to minors.

Depending on the offense and the number of times a student has committed an offense, reprimands range from housing probation and alcohol education to suspension from the University for one year.

Vasconcellos said the new alcohol policy was not changed considerably from the old policy which emphasized student safety.

"These weren't that different from the policy we have right now. We're letting students be responsible for their actions but also protecting students." Vasconcellos said. "Students have a right to be in a safe environment without alcohol around them. That's where we're coming from right now."

Thompson said there would be an emphasis on educational programs to deter students from drinking on campus.

"The part that says alcohol education [on the chart] after a first offense would be a one shot deal. To show the physiological effects of alcohol as well as other problems alcohol causes. We want it to be more interactive. It won't be like a one or two hour class in lecture format," Thompson said.

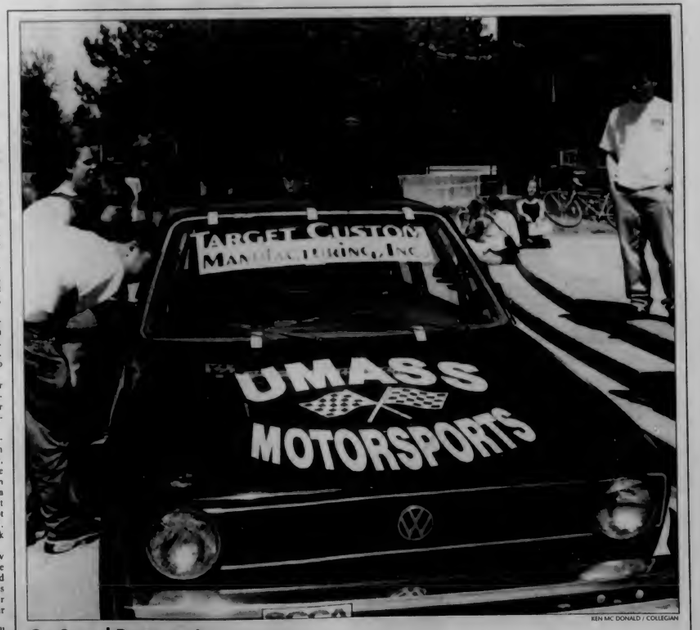
New sex drug causing controversy

By John Hendren
Associated Press

NEW YORK — With Viagra becoming the hottest drug on the market, health insurers are demanding proof from doctors that their patients really do need the impotence pill and are not just would-be Casanovas looking to spice up their sex lives.

Insurers also are being forced to answer this tricky question: How much sex is enough?

Because Viagra is a use-it-as-you-need-it drug and not a daily pill, insurers are trying to determine what constitutes a monthly supply: six, eight, more?



For now, not all insurance companies cover the $10-a-pill drug, which is available by prescription only. Many of them, like Aetna U.S. Healthcare, haven't decided what to do.

Some of those that are paying for Viagra are doing so only under temporary rules. But those that do cover the drug all require a doctor to diagnose the patient as impotent.

"We have to make safe and efficacious drugs available to those men who have a real medical necessity, men who without Viagra have absolutely no chance of having an erection," said Beverly Hayon, a spokeswoman for the HMO giant Kaiser Permanente, which does not cover Viagra — at least not yet. Kaiser officials are meeting this week to decide what to do.

Many insurers, including New York's Empire Blue Cross and Blue Shield, Prudential Healthcare, United Healthcare and California's WellPoint Health Networks, cover some patients, depending on their health plan.

Cigna HealthCare will pay for all or some of the coverage depending on the policy and only if patients already are using a rival treatment, such as injections or penile implants.

"We hope that in a year or so there will be pretty good coverage," said Marianne Caprino, a spokeswoman for Viagra's maker, Pfizer Inc.

In the meantime, regulators are beginning to pressure insurers to spell out their coverage plans for Viagra.

"How often is often enough to have sex? I don't know," said Art Levin, director of the New York-based Center for Medical Consumers. "But this drug makes us get into these bizarre questions."

University of Tennessee urologist Robert Wake noted that some insurers cover a 90-day supply of medically necessary drugs. "The problem is, what is a 90-day supply?," he said.

United Healthcare covers eight pills a month, the number used in Pfizer's research. Cigna pays for six for patients in its more flexible plans.

A 48-year-old Memphis, Tenn., patient, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said Prudential paid for the first six pills he used to overcome his diabetes-induced impotence. "I'm not going to tell you I'm 19 again, but it works," he said.

Viagra is taken an hour before sex, and the effect can last as long as a day. It doesn't directly cause an erection but boosts the blood flow during sexual stimulation to enhance performance. A 52-year-old Atlanta man said he's gladly paying out of his own pocket to use it twice a week.

He's not alone. By April 17, after only three weeks on the market, Viagra accounted for 94.4 percent of all impotence drug sales, according to Industry researcher IMS America. And the number of American men seeking any prescription treatments each week as jumped six-fold to 129,422.

And with an estimated 30 million men in the United States suffering from erectile problems, drug industry analysts say Viagra's annual sales could top $1 billion within a few years. At about $10 a pill, Wake said, "it is fairly affordable for most of the patients who need it, and most of the patients are willing to pay for it themselves if they have to."

New York insurance regulators stepped up the pressure Tuesday, asking 100 insurers for detailed policies on whether and when they will pay for Viagra. Regulators want to know who and how many pills will be covered.

Regulators also want to prevent abuse of the drug by anyone who wants to "just take it for fun," said New York Insurance Superintendent Neil D. Levin.

After all, said Art Levin, the consumer activist, there may be some higher priorities in public policy.

"If you assume that there are only so many dollars around in this era of cost containment, does $10 for a Viagra pill take money away from other health considerations?," he said.

Building a better UMass

Microsoft draws fire yet again

By Ted Bridis
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The last time Microsoft faced scrutiny by the Justice Department, it was over an electronic link for its online service that the company had included in Windows 95.

Competitors such as America Online and CompuServe complained bitterly then that Microsoft was unfairly using its Windows muscle to lure subscribers.

But the online service proved an unqualified flop, reportedly losing hundreds of millions annually since 1995 with fewer than 3 million subscribers. AOL, by contrast, now has more than 11 million members.

Far from humiliated by its past marketplace goofs, Microsoft is embracing them during the latest antitrust probe by the Justice Department.

Microsoft's Windows operating systems are used on roughly 90 percent of the world's desktop computers. But in an unusual strategy to prove it doesn't unfairly dominate every niche market it enters, Microsoft and supporters have gone out of their way at times — in public statements and private meetings — to remember some of the company's embarrassing failures.

Microsoft, for example, frequently notes that its Internet browser is still less popular than one from rival Netscape Communication Corp. Netscape claims roughly 60 percent of the market.

And during a federal appeals court hearing last week, a Microsoft lawyer described how Intuit Inc.'s Quicken finance software — used by 10 million people — can automatically retrieve stock prices using the Internet. He didn't mention Microsoft's own personal finance software, Microsoft Money, which competes against Quicken but is far less popular.

"Is our track record perfect? Far, far from it," said Bob Herbold, Microsoft's chief operating officer. "The important issue is that customers decide who is successful and who isn't. That's the way it should be... Certainly in the cases (of the Microsoft Network online service and Microsoft Money), we didn't listen carefully enough."

The Justice Department stopped worrying about the Microsoft Network online service's advantage when Microsoft showed that customers could also easily subscribe to CompuServe or AOL. In the latest investigation, the Justice Department contends that Microsoft is illegally forcing computer makers who sell Windows 95 to also sell its Internet browser.

In recent meetings with reporters, Microsoft's general counsel has pointedly mentioned a competitor's disk utilities — software tools that help maintain and optimize a computer. Microsoft bundled some of those tools as part of Windows 95, similar to how it's now bundling Internet Explorer with Windows.

That forced competitors — like Symantec Corp., which makes the best-selling Norton Utilities — to improve their stand-alone utilities. Some, like Norton, are widely considered better than the free ones included with Windows.

"Whatever competitive advantage Microsoft may enjoy in the sale of operating systems, the company has been singularly ineffectual in leveraging that advantage," said Robert Levy, a senior fellow at the libertarian Cato Institute, who opposes antitrust action against Microsoft. "Customers refuse to buy a product they do not like."

But the company's critics aren't relieved that even an industry giant like Microsoft can make software that doesn't always shoot up the charts.

Miyoshi said each student had three to nine pairs of Nike, and many of them had been attacked for their shoes.

Miyoshi also told the story of a 15-year-old girl she met on a trip to see Nike factories in Asia. The girl had worked in the Nike factory since she was 13. Miyoshi saw her pay slip which reported that the girl had worked 98 overtime hours over a two-week period. She told Miyoshi that if she did not work overtime she would not be able to survive on the money she was paid.

"They are accountable for their workers," Miyoshi said.

She was introduced by Martin Espada, a professor in the English department. He said he contacted Global Exchange after Nike had written him a letter asking him to write poetry for their commercials. He listed many reasons why he would turn down their offer, and said the most important to him was their treatment of factory workers around the world.

A 14-year-old who would only use the name "Michael" attended the lecture, and thought the program was ineffective because people attending the lecture already knew about the abuses of Nike.

"I use to wear a lot of designer stuff," he said. "Now I'm becoming aware of the practices. What's going on is wrong," Michael said.

Kin Eric Yip, an undeclared sophomore said he was not aware of the labor practices of Nike, and called the lecture "quite impactful."

"We all generally buy Nike shoes without thinking about what we're buying, about the abuses," Yip said. He was wearing a pair of Nikes he said he bought last week without realizing the abuses of the company. "I think, what am I doing paying all this money for this?"

Miyoshi finished by saying that a letter writing campaign to Michael Jordan was unsuccessful. She praised the work of basketball player Chris Webber who turned down a Nike contract because they marketed shoes to an audience which could not afford them.

■ policy

Some senators asked if the alcohol policy would be enforced off-campus.

"We do have a subcommittee that is looking at this to see what we want to do with greek fraternities and sororities and what we want to do off campus. We only apply the student code of conduct in serious cases. I don't see a move in the enforcement of the alcohol policy off campus," Vasconcellos said.

Senator Seth Avakian (Southwest, JA) was concerned that the policy changes would push the alcohol problem of campus.

"I guess I don't see how this will drive people off campus to drink because we haven't changed the policy that much from what it is now," Vasconcellos said.

According to the recommended changes, there is a division between the four offenses. The offenses of possession of a large amount of alcohol and dispensing alcohol to minors carry stiffer penalties than the other two.

Vasconcellos defined what is considered a "large volume of alcohol."

"Anything more than a case of beer, a bottle of wine, or a bottle of hard alcohol is considered a large amount of alcohol," Vasconcellos said.

Vasconcellos said the Residential Alcohol Program (REAP) would be changed under the new alcohol policy.

"Right now everyone is sent to the REAP program. But for students who don't have an alcohol problem they say 'what am I doing here,' and the ones who have an alcohol problem feel the program isn't helping them."

Bilingual education's importance

Julie Fialkow

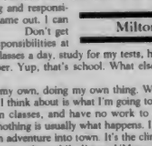
Another attempt is being made to make our schools a more homogenized fish bowl, limiting minority children's rights to an equal education. Proposition 227 is a ballot measure in California that would break down the state's current bilingual education programs if it passes. Under the proposition, the current law, which calls for non-English speaking children to go through three to five years of bilingual education, will be replaced with a more English- based one-year program, according to the Associated Press (Collegian, 4/28).

The proposition is dangerous because it places children hostage, in the midst of what is essentially an argument in politics. President Clinton opposes this measure and Governor of California Pete Wilson commented that the President was using the issue to "play politics." The AP also stated that although Wilson hasn't made a decision on his stance on the proposition, he says that he is "leaning that way [in favor of the proposition]."

Wilson is obviously the one playing politics when, according to the AP, of some five million students in his constituency, 1.4 million have limited English proficiency. It's quite obvious his concerns aren't related to what's best for all these children that could be affected. I wonder if it's a coincidence that the author of this proposition is Ron Unz, a California millionaire. I wonder if a poor farmer had authored the same bill it would get similar attention or the possible support of Governor Wilson. Somehow money usually sweetens the deal.

The AP states that under Proposition 227, also called the Unz Amendment, students who aren't native English speakers would be taught "overwhelmingly" in English for a year, and then would be moved into regular classrooms. This sounds like a really stellar idea. Let's teach students one of the most complex languages in the world in just one year — less time then it takes most adults to learn a language adequately. Under this proposition, students will become even more frustrated and insecure with themselves then they already are with the current bilingual education classes. After their year- long English lesson, they can get shipped off into overcrowded classrooms, where they will inevitably fade away into the background, being passed through the grades. Most will receive a completely worthless education, compared to their English-speaking peers. If the current structure of bilingual education is flawed, Proposition 227 will make it truly disastrous.

The majority of non-English speaking students in California are native Spanish speakers. In 1995, the Federal government released statistics that said 30 percent of high school dropouts are Hispanic. This is sadly not surprising, when the schools are structured to encourage the success of white English speakers, and leave others to fend for themselves in discouragement and frustration.



Thank goodness President Clinton is objecting to this proposition. Maybe if he takes a trip out to some California schools where the children will be most affected by the Proposition, he will become even more inclined to improve the current situation. According to the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service, in 1996 the total number of legal immigrants admitted to the country was 915,900, a 27 percent increase from 1995. Proposition 227 aims to make it even more difficult for these immigrants to adjust to their new home, which I believe is precisely the intention of Ron Unz.

It is no revelation that education is the key to success in this society. We pride ourselves on giving access to everyone, regardless of their race, creed or color. But the English-only bias is a challenge to this tenant. In this decade, it has become increasingly obvious that we need to address the English-only bias. Proposition 227 seems almost incomprehensible, unless the goal is to maintain the unbalanced racial hierarchy that exists in this country. I'm pretty sure the politicians who worked on this bill have never sat in an overcrowded English as a Second Language classroom. They probably have never been in a situation where they themselves were in the minority, not understanding the language that was being spoken, but being expected to learn anyway.

Of course the problem is this: too few bilingual teachers, and not enough funds to hire or train new ones. As a country, we need to realistically examine the changing population of this country, and the new challenges we are facing. Our educational system must bend and adjust to meet these new challenges and accommodate the new kinds of learning needs that arise. Proposition 227 threatens to move us back in time, instead of forward, into the future.

My fantasy life

Milton Valencia

"What are you doing this summer?" asks a friend in an everyday conversation. "Going home to work," I reply.

Reality Check?

Thanks, I needed that.

Here and there I tend to forget that I'm still in a real world. The end of my first year at college is approaching, so my little adventures in Fantasia will soon come to an end. Those days of working and responsibility are calling my name out. I can run, but I can't hide. Don't get me wrong, I have responsibilities at school. I go to three classes a day, study for my tests, here and there write a paper. Yup, that's school. What else is there? Nothing.

I'm here, living on my own, doing my own thing. What thing? The only thing I think about is what I'm going to do when I get back from classes, and have no work to do. Sitting around doing nothing is usually what happens. I get excited when I take an adventure into town. It's the climax of my day. It seems that while I'm at UMass, I'm just at UMass. I don't do anything else. I don't think about anything else, because I don't know about anything anymore. There's a whole world out there that I'm missing because I'm away at the Magical World of Fun.

This whole year has just been a year of fun, not worrying about anything else. Responsibility, what's that?

Now I must go home, a year older, a year "smarter." Yeah, as if knowing what ancient fossil was discovered in Peru and how they found it will sure help me in my in my own search for summer cash. "It was the crown of the third king, of the fifth century, of the eighth dynasty," my professor will tell me.

"That's good," my boss at work will tell me. "Now get working. We have a lot to do today, twentieth century, in the real world." Real world, what's that?

I picked up the Boston Herald the other day and started to edge back to society. For some reason I forgot that there are still newspapers out there other than the Collegian. I read news stories about a kidnapping, murders, medical discoveries, and even how toadfish are being sent to space to help a study in the effect of weightlessness on vertigo, motion sickness and dizziness. What? I forgot about things like that. If I didn't pick up the Herald that day, I would have been thinking about what action the Alcoholic Beverage Commission was going to take against Amherst Brewing Company when they found an underage person drinking there. After passing that article, I checked out the Campus Police Log. The first incident I read talked of a private residence on Butterfield Terrace being struck with paintballs from Gorman Residence Hall. The second one said a fight was reported to be in progress in front of Gorman Residence Hall. After a year of reading of the same incidents, you tend to forget that there are real subjects out there in the real world. Before I sat down to write this column, I tried to think of something important, something real that I could write about. "Tell me one word that comes to your mind," I ask a friend, in hope of some sense of direction to a topic. "Keg," he replies. Yup, that's important.

Then the next story you read in the Collegian will be about a student getting arrested for a keg in his dorm room. It's the same news over and over. You forget about everything else. The topic of discussion on the floor one night was being famous. I used to think, "Yeah, I want to win a Pulitzer Prize for writing." Others might have wanted to become an actor, or a professional athlete. "I want to be in the Guinness Book of World Records," one person said. "Yeah," added another. "We can do it. We can break the record for most couches in a dorm room." It's a typical comment from a resident of Fantasy Land. What a land it is! Only in Fantasy Land can you stop on the way to class and pick up a free T-shirt, along with a brand new credit card, just for you. You can use it as much as you want in Fantasy Land! Reality Check!

Fantasy Land is coming to a close, and responsibility is still out there. When I return home for the summer, I'll probably feel like I've been in a cartoon for a year. It will be hard, but I'll adjust. "What did you learn after your first year of college?" someone will probably ask. "That there is a real world out there," I'll reply.

Doonesbury BY GARRY TRUDEAU

The last laugh

Luke Meredith

It's almost over, kids. The time for Lukie Dookie to drift off into the sunset is coming pretty quickly.

I only have two columns left after this week. My usual slot next Thursday, and then the finale — the senior column — on May 13. And since I have something special planned next week (tentatively titled "I Love You All"), this is the last chance for the funny stuff.

Maybe ever.

Now, I was driving around in my new 1987 Chevy Cavalier wagon (which I will not attempt to make fun of, because I don't want to front on ex-Collegian hero Andrew Bryce's legacy), thinking of how I can get paid to be funny. I don't want this to end, you know. It's fun being funny (even trying to be funny can pass the time).

What career should I choose? Investment banking? Retail? Forestry? Landscape Design? Sports writing?

Nah. None of them are ever funny.

What about stand-up comedy, I say? They get paid, and most of them aren't even that funny.

I drove around Amherst for a little while, thinking of what I'd say if I was a stand-up comedian. Well, I thought just as much about what I'd wear (expensive suits — classy look, or jeans, baseball hat backwards and t-shirt — college look?), but while everyone else was driving around singing, this is what I was thinking of.

Well, I sang some too. But don't tell anybody.

And no, I wasn't drunk.

The Act

I come out on stage, everybody starts clapping, even though I haven't said anything.

"Thank you, you've been great! Goodnight. Remember, I'll be at the Hu-Ke-Lau in Chicopee on May 14. Drive home safe, and tell your mom I'll be over later."

People are stunned. They're like "What? But he just came out?"

I'm in their heads. Then I come back out, laughing away.

"I figured I couldn't top that, so I left. Besides, I'm supposed to meet your mom uptown in five minutes."

People start dying. "Damn, he's funny," they say. "I think I like this little fat guy."

"You ever eat airline food? Man, it sucks. I had the chicken, it tasted like fish, so I sent it back. Then I get the fish, and it tastes like chicken! What gives, man?"

I'm killing them. "I flew last week, and he's right. Man did the food suck," some guy in the back says.

"I went on a blind date once, and she was so ugly, man. I asked her where she worked, and she said, "Well, I'm out of work right now. But once the Cleveland Browns come back, the coaching staff told me I'm a lock at left tackle."

Place goes wild. "Man, I had a blind date once. She was huge too."

"Man, you ever watch Growing Pains? Man, that Maggie Seaver was hot! I'd like her to send me to my room, man She's almost as hot as your mom!"

Guys are giving each other high-fives. "Man, she was hot," they say. "Oh yeah."

The Maggie Seaver bit is money, and I would probably leave after that. I mean, how funny is Maggie Seaver?

"Alright. Hey seriously, I gotta go. Your mom's waiting. Thanks for coming out. You've all been great. Remember, the Hu-Ke-Lau, May 14. There's a two-drink minimum, so you better get wasted. Goodnight."

I get a standing ovation. Guys are screaming, "Yeah, man. That little fat guy was awesome. It was funny, because it was true." And only a few people notice that I was only been on stage for five minutes.

Hmm.

But if anybody starts barking about my brief stage time, I'll just tell them, "Look, I told you your mom was waiting."

They'd probably just keeping laughing. "You're the king, man. The king," they would say.

And I'd laugh all the way to the bank, hoping their moms wouldn't be mad that I was a few minutes late.

Letters to the Editor

Bias in the classroom

To the Editor:

You can imagine my surprise in class when I heard my professor refer to certain birth control methods — methods which do not allow a fertilized egg to implant itself in the uterus — as forms of abortion. My reaction went from surprise to outrage when the use of these contraceptive measures, such as the morning after pills or RU-486, which expel a fertilized egg less than half the size of a pinhead, was referred to as "killing a person." You might think an inflammatory remark like this was made in a theology class or perhaps a class on social problems. No, this was a science class, biology.

I spoke with the professor after class to tell him how disturbed I was by his presentation. No woman should have to sit in class to hear that a personal decision she has made or might make in the future makes her a "murderer." Since he has told students that scientific theory relies only on irrefutable facts, I reminded him that there is no unanimous consent among scientists on this issue. I asked that he be honest in presenting the situation by acknowledging that his perspective was not the only one within the scientific community. I asked him to discontinue the use of the expression "killing a person" because it implies a moral judgement, not a scientific perspective. His response was to compare my knowledge to people who once thought the earth was flat, that I had been duped by mindless propaganda. In his opinion, only credible scientists supported his position. Besides, he assured me, he would make sure to tell the class that each woman has to make her own choice about terminating a pregnancy. Some choice if the question is framed around whether "to kill or not to kill a person."

My point is that this professor has made a value judgement and found only those who agree with him to be credible. However, he hides these value judgements behind the shield of "science." As students, we are used to reminding ourselves that our professors bring their personal biases into the classroom; it is only human. But we need to remember that even those within the field of science has these biases. It is a value judgment that determines when one stage of human development ends and another begins. And value judgments always serve someone's purpose — even when they pose as science.

Posters inaccurate

To the Editor:

"Attention: Right-Minded Students!" — this message and the bigoted messages that accompany it come neither from Student Government Association (SGA) Presidential candidate Amy Pellegrino, nor her running mate Jeff Howe. The whole poster is filled with lies and half-truths... the kind intended to fool the average student into the assumption that Pellegrino and Howe are racist, sexist, homophobic, anti-Semitic, and about as far to the political right as possible. The message is simply not true. Let me clarify a few things for the record:

First off, this message is a smear campaign designed to destroy Pellegrino and Howe's chances in the upcoming election. The poster's message is terror, plain and simple. Pellegrino and Howe continue to work on their campaign, determined to win despite the fraudulent posters. Because the message appears as an endorsement by a non-existent organization it is essentially anonymous, the approach of a coward who cannot defend his or her argument. Like many other students on campus, I am sick of the election nonsense — now I am also sickened by the methods being used against Pellegrino and Howe.

Secondly, not only do the poster's arguments make it appear that Pellegrino and Howe are hateful and opposed to cultural diversity, but they also imply that their views on multiculturalism are in line with those of the Klu Klux Klan (KKK) — a blatant and malicious lie that could easily result in physical violence against them. Thankfully, Public Safety is taking the concerns for Pellegrino and Howe's safety seriously. As for their actual views of multiculturalism, I can state that as a long-time leader in the gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender community, Pellegrino and Howe have been supportive of GLBT issues when approached. Furthermore, they have approached me with concerns involving the disabled community on campus, a community whose needs are often ignored by the University.

Students, don't be fooled. Pellegrino and Howe are both outstanding student leaders with broad-based support from many communities. Someone feels they have to lie to insure that Pellegrino and Howe will not win.

holding pattern n. — 1. A usually circular course flown by an aircraft awaiting clearance to land at an airport. 2. A term used to describe the new Dave Matthews Band album.

After selling out the cavernous Foxboro Stadium in a matter of hours, the Dave Matthews Band can rightfully be put in the same league with U2 and R.E.M. amongst the most popular bands in the country. The looming question is: are Dave Matthews Band in the same company as the above- mentioned in an artistic sense?

In a word, no. Not even close actually. While both U2 and R.E.M. both have established themselves as consistent innovators, Dave Matthews Band have done little to dispel the notion they are anything more substantial than a one- trick pony on Before These Crowded Streets. It's a musical confection that's easily likable and just as easily forgotten.

Considering they've included a re-recorded version of "Halloween," one must wonder if Matthews is running out of ideas. After spending almost a year writing and recording the new material, it's not hard to look disparagingly at the fact that Before These Crowded Streets only has nine "new" songs, at least half of which are pure filler.

The main problem with Dave Matthews Band is this: for all their earnest charm, they are exceedingly boring. Sure, the songs are all well-constructed (perhaps to a fault) and pleasant, but that's the problem. The listener can just throw the disc in the CD player, press play and sit back. Nothing Dave Matthews does here, or has ever done for that matter, requires the listener to actually work at listening. There's no subtleties in the lyrics, no textures in the music. What you hear is what you get, time and time again. This fact alone helps considerably in explaining their burgeoning fanbase.

They are a band totally devoid of any passion in what they play and say. The lyrics are disposable — I mean how can anyone think "Look... Here we are... On this starry night staring into space" is a moving lyric?

"The Last Stop" incorporates Indian influences and Bela Fleck's banjo playing, but the melody is slight, the hook unmemorable. At least Matthews has a little feistiness in his singing. The same cannot be said for the rest of the album.

Lead single "Don't Drink the Water" is merely a standard- fare DMB song, a rambling dirge complete with competent instrumentals and Matthews' quirky, nondescript singing style.

The album hits a real lull after "Halloween," with the last five songs seemingly meshing into one long, painful excursion that goes nowhere. Especially weak are "The Stone" and "Crush," both of which run well over seven minutes and recall the longwindedness of Phish. It's almost enough to put someone to sleep.

The entire album is not without merit, however. "Stay (Wasting Time)" is the catchiest song on Before These Crowded Streets, and their finest moment since "Ants Marching." The brassy horns and diva-esque backing vocals from Tawatha Agee, Cindy Myzell and Brenda White help to make the tune a footstompin' delight.

Much of the blame for Before These Crowded Streets falls squarely on the shoulders of producer Steve Lillywhite, who sat behind the boards on Under The Table and Dreaming. While Lillywhite has once again done a credible job creating the "sound" of the streets, he has failed to rein in the group's tendency to meander.

Quite frankly, Matthews and his bandmates have already firmly established a knack for writing songs that showcase their eclectic pop-rock leanings with bursts of instrumental virtuosity courtesy of drummer Carter Beauford and acoustic violinist extraordinaire Boyd Tinsley. Now they need to learn how to vary the formula. Good luck, guys. C- his eye. Saving Private Ryan should be this summer's best film.

THE MASK OF ZORRO
Directed by Martin Campbell

Antonio Banderas dons the black garb in this energizing rendition of the serial classic, with Anthony Hopkins as his mentor, and the scorching newcomer Catherine Zeta Jones his object of affection. Zorro went through some production problems before Goldeneye director Campbell took over; it's been smooth sailing — or riding, in this case — since then.

THE GOOD: Banderas had this type of role pinned down in Desperado, and executive producer Spielberg ensures it will be classy.

THE BAD: TV remakes, in the immortal words of George Bush, are "bad, bad."

VERDICT: Problems on the set aside, Zorro looks very sexy and a lot of fun.

ARMAGEDDON
Directed by Michael Bay

There's a clock, a gift from Disney, that sits on top a Collegian computer, counting down the days till 7-1-98, the release of Armageddon. The hype is as big as the movie itself — kind of a half Volcano, half Apollo 13 mix starring Bruce Willis as the head of a drill team that remains the only thing between Earth and asteroids the size of Texas.

THE GOOD: You can count on producer Jerry Bruckheimer (Con Air) and director Bay (The Rock) to get the testosterone flowing.

THE BAD: Staggering lack of originality. Plus, destructive space objects are popular, and Deep Impact, released next Friday, has Armageddon beat.

VERDICT: "Man's finest hour" may be Hollywood's worst.

THE TRUMAN SHOW
Directed by Peter Weir

"All the world is a stage, and we are merely players," rings the quote from Shakespeare. Imagine your whole life being set up, fake, with everyone watching, and you have The Truman Show, Peter Weir's comedy/drama starring Jim Carrey in his first true acting role. Weir got Robin Williams to pull it off in Dead Poet's Society, can he accomplish the same feat here? Carrey is Truman Burbank, a kid who grows up to find out his life has been a 24-hour cable TV show masterminded by a brilliant producer (Apollo 13's Ed Harris). How will he turn out?

THE GOOD: Australian Weir (Dead Poets Society, Witness, The Year of Living Dangerously) is one of Hollywood's most intriguing craftsman. Superb script from Gattaca's Andrew Niccol.

THE BAD: Awful promotion campaign. Paramount has a great film on their hands and instead are marketing it like just another Jim Carrey comedy.

VERDICT: Early buzz on the film has been nothing less than astounding — The Truman Show might be the surprise of the year.

THE X-FILES
Directed by Rob Bowman

Bowman may be the director, but the creative force here is inarguably Chris Carter, the founder of the greatest cult TV hit since "Star Trek." Like that science-fiction phenomenon, "The X-Files" is easily the most cinematic show on television. Will it translate to the big screen? Most definitely, as David Duchovny and Gillian Anderson take over where they left off from the cliffhanger episode set to air later this month.

THE GOOD: This long-awaited epic will be savored by die-hard fans, and the preview shows it will deliver to the rest of the crowd, too.

THE BAD: Still, if you don't know your "X-Files" in and out, you're kinda screwed.

VERDICT: Carter redefined television, but film will be much harder.

LETHAL WEAPON 4
Directed by Richard Donner

The Lethal Weapon series is perhaps the only one, save James Bond, that we welcome with a gleeful smile. It's hard to get tired of the Mel Gibson–Danny Glover banter, and this time around Chris Rock joins the fun along with series staples Joe Pesci and Rene Russo.

THE GOOD: After a couple of quirky/serious recent roles, Gibson returns to the form that made him the most- fun-to-watch movie star of the '80s. Rock should make a welcome, hip addition to the already colorful cast.

THE BAD: Lethal 4 was filmed so fast that the cast didn't even have a finished script when shooting began.

VERDICT: The preview proves that 4 will be fun, bottom line.

Ethnic Heritage Ensemble to perform tonight

The Ethnic Heritage Ensemble will perform tonight at Hampden Theatre.

COURTESY ETHNIC HERITAGE ENSEMBLE

By Joe Sullivan
Collegian Staff

As the third and final installment of WMUA's Magic Triangle Jazz Series, the Ethnic Heritage Ensemble will play Hampden Theater at 8 p.m. tonight.

The group has been performing music rooted in traditional sounds of Africa and Latin America as well as other parts of the world for nearly twenty years, and has recorded primarily on European labels. Their catalogue includes Impressions (Red Records), Three Gentlemen from Chicago (Moers Music), Ancestral Song (Silkheart), Hang Tuff (Open Minds), this year's 21st Century Union March (Silkheart) and their only American releases, Dance With The Ancestors (Chameleon) and The Continuum (Delmark Records).

The ensemble began to take shape in 1976 after percussionist Kahil El'Zabar, upon graduating from the school of Chicago's Association for the Advancement of Creative Musicians, collaborated with tenor saxophonist Edward Wilkerson, Jr.

Wilkerson left the group in 1997 to devote time to two other outfits, 8 Bold Souls and Shadow Vignettes. The current lineup of the ensemble has El'Zabar on percussion, lead vocals and trap drums; Joseph Bowie on trombone, percussion and vocals; Ernest "Khabeer" Dawkins on saxophones, and Atu Harold Murray on flutes, earth drum and other percussion instruments.

Kahil El'Zabar, raised on Chicago's South Side, has played with everyone from Dizzy Gillespie to Paul Simon and Stevie Wonder, and he has played everything from trap drum to kalimba. He has also authored a book, Mis'Taken Brilliance, has scored two movies, Mo' Money and How U Like Me Now, and has starred in three movies, Savannah, So Low But Not Alone and The Last Set.

Ernest Khabeer Dawkins has played with such talented musicians as Anthony Braxton and Roy Haynes, and he currently is a woodwinds instructor at Columbia College and band director in Chicago Public Schools.

Joseph Bowie joined the ensemble in 1988, after leading the jazz/funk group, Defunkt. He has also played with David Murray's Big Band and toured with Charlie Haden's Liberation Orchestra.

Harold Atu Murray has played with jazz greats Count Basie, Duke Ellington, and Sun Ra, as well as Ray Charles. He has also received acclaim for his sculptures which number over 4,000 and are on display all over the world.

Tickets are $6 for students and $9 for the general public. Hampden Theater is located in the Hampden Dining Commons in the Southwest Residential Area.

Brecker's latest is sophisticated

On May 12, Impulse will release Michael Brecker's, Two Blocks From The Edge, his first new album since 1996's Grammy Award–winning, Tales From The Hudson.

Brecker's career began to take off in 1968, when he arrived in New York to play with his brother in the fusion band, Dreams. Since his funk–filled beginnings, he has collaborated with a list of performers that includes Herbie Hancock, McCoy Tyner, Pat Metheny, Chick Corea, Paul Simon and Joni Mitchell.

With all the tracks having been recorded in one take, Brecker's latest holds a modern, urban sophistication about it, and though at times his playing may sound a bit glossy at times, the CD is overall very solid.

"Madame Toulouse" begins the recording with a jingling tambourine played by Jeff "Tain" Watts that eventually leads to some heavy hitting percussion. "El Nino" sees Brecker and his quintet break into some Latin rhythms and again, the rhythm section consisting of Watts, bassist James Genus, percussionist Don Alias and pianist Joey Calderazzo lay down a great bottom on top of which Brecker just flows.

"Cat's Cradle" features a mournful Calderazzo piano, while Brecker displays a certain gentility to his playing, capturing the sorrow the song is meant to convey. "The Impaler," featuring the use of a cowbell, is the best track on the CD, because it shows that Brecker wasn't lying when he said that Coltrane was a definite influence — the sax phrases on this one are insane.

Perhaps the most intriguing thing on the disk is the final cut, "Delta City Blues," which sounds disjointed and quirky, but also raw, like nothing else Brecker plays on this recording.

All the songs on the album do a good job of evolving within themselves, with consistent build–ups and breakdowns in speed, and sound layers constantly being added and subtracted.

Legacy has done jazz lovers everywhere a huge service with the March release of Miles Davis Live At Carnegie Hall, the first time the historic 1961 concert has been released in its entirety.

The double disc covers Davis and his quintet, consisting of tenor man Hank Mobley, pianist Wynton Kelly, bassist Paul Chambers and drummer Jimmy Cobb, as well as the legendary trumpet–player as a soloist with Gil Evans' orchestra. The recording provides an excellent look into Davis' sound before he broke with the bop purists and moved into more avant–garde territory.

"So What" seems to sneak the set in, but then explodes as Davis exhibits some brash high–octave phrases, met by Cobb with crashing percussion and some wrinkly abstraction coming out of Mobley's tenor. The orchestra comes in at the end, but it is almost unnoticeable because the quintet is so intense.

"Walkin'" breaks in immediately from a blaring trumpet– featured "Teo," only to move faster and faster, with spastic trumpet and tenor, and the brashest, most precise bass solo of all time. The drum breaks are awesome, as Cobb just pounds the skins with wreckless pleasure and searing passion.

"The Meaning Of The Blues/Lament" shows the beauty of having an orchestra play behind Miles Davis, though it may seem like a conflict of interest. The song is solemn, with Davis playing a stirring, grave series of phrases that are very beautiful, and the fact that Evans' orchestra is able to hold back the way it does is testament to its talent.

This Carnegie Hall concert is outstanding for its range of sound, rhythms and arrangements, but it is still only the second best live jazz recording — second only to John Coltrane's Live At Birdland. High praise, especially since this album is Miles before he has reached his full potential.

Why we won't get ESPN on-campus

There's something that definitely needs to be cleared up. Last week, the SGA reported on a meeting that HSCN had last week that involved the possible channel line-up for next year. As a part of the group, (not committee) in charge of representing the students on campus and their aspirations for what should be shown on television, I would like explain to everyone exactly what is happening, and what the possibilities for next year's line-up.

First of all, as reported, ESPN and MTV are out. It's just too expensive, and it's not possible to get the funds for it. The total amount that we have to spend per student is $7.60. If you're anything like I was before I attended this meeting, you have no idea what that $7.60 means. It's fairly simple. We have $7.60 to spend on certain stations that we do not get free, and are the most necessary for campus life.

Most of the stations that we receive we do not have to pay for. These stations include the affiliates for, NBC, ABC, CBS and Fox, as well as the international channel, the movie channel, and Nick at Nite's TV Land. Comedy Central and MuchMusic are part of a plan that has been negotiated by HSCN, so they are definitely in the contract at least for the next year.

When everything has been subtracted, each student has $7.60 to spend. So what is the $7.60 going towards? That is the main question on everyone's mind. At this point, most of it is being pumped into the CNN package that we receive that includes Headline News, TBS and CNN/SI. By purchasing this package, we get more of a discount on all of the Turner Networks, and are able to receive the most programming for such a small budget. The rest of the money is being used on Univision, BET, and the Cartoon Network. It is clear why Univision and BET are necessary, we need to have something in the programming for everyone, and these stations are clearly needed to keep diversity in the line-up. The Cartoon Network is inexpensive, and is pretty much the best station that we can afford with the little money that is left over. You may remember TLC (The Learning Channel) was removed from the line-up last year, and replaced with The Cartoon Network. This was done after polling students about what they would rather see, and the realization that TLC was not something that everyone needed, or really wanted to see. It was also brought up at the meeting that The Cartoon Network is much better for the children that live in the on campus housing program. They need something to watch as well as everyone else, and this network is perfect for them. So to make a long story short, what we have right now in the channel line-up, is pretty much what is going to stay. After consideration about changing the CNN package to something that would give us more channels for less money, it seems that even this package will stay the same. So there will not be much in the way of new channels next year.

Now that everyone knows the background of what happened at that meeting, it will be easier to explain why ESPN and MTV are such an impossible luxury. If HSCN were to add ESPN, it would cost them $9.90 per student. That would mean that we would need to get over two dollars per student more, and use all of the funding to buy ESPN. This would mean losing almost all of the pay channels that we are receiving at this moment. Since it is impossible to get anymore money from every student due to President Bulger's promise of "absolutely no fee increases." Now imagine what it would cost to buy ESPN and MTV — we would have to double the budget for housing cable, and then triple it just to make up for all of the channels that we are losing.

Part of the reason that ESPN is so expensive is because of their recent contract signing with the NFL that someone must pick up the bill for. To accommodate for this, ESPN raised its price per ownership, and made it even more difficult for UMass to purchase the leader in sports programming.

So for now we will have to settle for what we are receiving. We should definitely be thankful that HSCN is able to do what they are doing right now just to get the stations that we currently receive. HSCN is doing an excellent job, and when compared to many other universities in the country (mainly Harvard University who doesn't have any cable plan at all) we are extremely lucky.

Now that all the technical stuff is out of the way, let's see what is going on in the TV world.

NBC aired "Merlin" this week. After getting excellent ratings and reviews, "Merlin" has proven to be the hit TV mini-series of the year. According to my RA Gina, since "Merlin" was a quality film, it really can't compare to any of the mini-series that are made by "Beverly Hills 90210's" Tiffani Amber-Theissen that are watched because they are so bad, and just to get a good laugh. As you might remember, a few weeks ago, I ranted about how bad some of these made–for–TV films are, and Gina felt necessary to prove me wrong by assuring me that next time Theissen stars in one of these wonderful films (which is usually eight nights a week) I must watch it. However, it is clear that "Merlin" was a winner, and will be out to rent on video in just a few short months.

career-wise with 50, one steal behind UMass Athletic Hall-of-Famer Sue Peters. By setting that new single-season record for runs scored, Galas is now in fourth place all-time with 113, while Osier is just two ahead of her in third place.

So, with both theorems soundly put to rest, the (one–two) Galas–Osier combination can be considered something in itself, and incomparable to anything in recent UMass softball memory.

Of course, each of them are their own individuals off the field. However, on the field, both Minutewomen are just like the other, and are one in the same.

"The first day I walked in here on my recruiting trip, everybody was like 'It's Tracy again,'" Galas said, who played high school softball for Tonawanda High School in central New York. "We both had baseball caps on, braces on, and its been like that since day one. It was really bad when I used to play outfield, because Tracy was out there, too. Coach would walk out there and say 'T.O., you need to be doing this.'

Mandy Galas power at the plate translates into runs for the Massachusetts softball team.

"We do a lot of things that complement each other, and we do a lot of things the same, so it has worked out well."

Osier remembers that first meeting between the two, and the duo from central New York has established a memorable combination the past three years.

"It is kind of strange, because we are from the same part of the state," Osier said, who played high school softball at Cicero North Syracuse in Mattydale, N.Y. "It is kind of ironic with what we've been able to do together, because at that time, she was introduced to me as my long lost twin sister. We really complement each other well, and through the last three years, we've kept building on that."

Through the scrutinizing eye of one of the most successful coaches in the Northeast Region, differences between the two players begin to evolve. While Sortino might not admit to a occasional slip of the tongue when it comes to naming either member of this one–two combination, she will admit that Galas and Osier are something special to her team's success.

"The thing they share, their commonality, is they're both hard competitors and they have very strong work ethics," Sortino said. "The way they're different is that Mandy brings speed and power to the plate, and a great tenacity. T.O. does it more in a softer, swifter sort of way, and there is a lot more finesse and ball placement to her.

"They're an incredible combination, because when Mandy's on it makes it more difficult to consider first getting her out, and then if you stutter at all, T.O. is on. So, they're a great one–two combination, and we're very fortunate to have them. They give us scoring chances whenever they touch the ball."

The main reason that Galas and Osier have been able to cross the plate at such a high success rate (a combined 81 runs scored) is because of their teammates behind them at the plate. At the third spot in the lineup, senior co–captain Kim Guthrie has had a career year, batting .416 with 42 RBI, while the duo of senior Kelly Buckley (.356, 28 RBI) and junior Becky George (.320, 16 RBI) have platooned at the four and five spots the past few weeks.

Except for Buckley, who had an outstanding freshman season, all of these players are experiencing career years. Last season, the Minutewomen had a tough time getting runs on the board for most of the season, but this season, consistency has been the key, and Galas and Osier have been the proverbial straws that stir this successful concoction.

"This is the best hitting team we've had here, and the freshmen have done really well, and come through in some key situations," Galas said, who credited summer softball last year as key to her success this season. "Last year, I started contributing more, and this year it's changed even more because I've been able to hit away, and get some RBI. I'm a lot more confident this year."

For Osier, their success lies in the duality of their strengths — simply put, UMass has two experienced leadoff hitters instead of one.

"The one thing that has helped us out is that we were both leadoff hitters before we came to UMass," Osier said. "We're used to getting things going, and that is what we like to do. If Mandy gets on base, I can move her over to second base with a bunt single. If they miss the play, we have two runners on base in a heartbeat.

"If she doesn't get on base, then I basically become the leadoff hitter. We're a great combination."

Tracey Osier is deadly on the basepaths, where she has burned opponents for the UMass single–season and career stolen base records.

As the case of any sport, this is the time of year when the "real season" begins. If the Minutewomen are able to capture the A–10 crown this weekend at URI, then a road trip faces them as they will travel to the winner of the America East Conference in the NCAA Play–In series.

Last season, this was the time of year that UMass shook off a disappointing regular season to march on to the WCWS in Oklahoma City. Galas believes that the team — and herself and Osier — needs to keep doing what they are doing without worrying about the pressure to perform in the postseason.

"I think this is about how softball should be played," Galas said, who has made the switch from the right side of the plate to the left here at UMass. "You have your slappers and bunters at the one–two and nine spots, and it has worked out to our advantage this season for us, because Gutty has had a great year. It's how I'm used to playing the game, and we're having a lot of success."

Last season's WCWS ride is not enough for Osier, and she and her senior teammates want to get back on the plane that leads to best of the nation.

"Last year was a learning experience, and we had a taste of what we can do," Osier said. "We've established a bandwagon, and we're dragging our teammates along with us. The coach doesn't want us to get too ahead of ourselves, and look too forward to reaching the WCWS.

"So, we're taking one day at a time, and the ride will start this weekend."

and at the same time was a good offensive player," McClellan said. "Her team spirit was excellent and her work ethic allowed her to serve as a role model for the team."

As the junior captain playing with two senior captains (attack Jen Bowen and midfielder Amy Leder), Anderson often allowed the upperclassmen to handle most of the vocal leadership duties, while she led with her actions.

"As a captain, Melissa led by example," McClellan said. "She is always hustling and it will be great to have her return next year."

Anderson will likely continue to serve as a revered team leader next year, along with whomever else is named to help with the duty of guiding a promising Minutewomen squad.

Faced this season with the task of filling the rather large shoes of graduated All–American Michele Warrington, Anderson responded with a positive attitude. She finished with 11 goals, equaling Warrington's senior total while making striving to make the necessary defensive plays to give UMass the opportunity on the other end.

"When I first got here I thought she was awesome, so it's an honor," Anderson said. "I respected here both on and off the field as I saw her help players with anything and everything."

McClellan was pleased that Anderson was able to effectively pick up where Warrington left off.

"She did so fantastically. Really on all fronts. As a role model, with her work ethic and her athleticism. Like Warrington, she had the ability to handle the ball in the midfield in addition to taking a player out of her game on the defensive end."

Beginning by picking up the game with the help of her brother, Anderson would eventually blossom into the current standout she is today. Playing on the junior varsity team in high school, she benefited under the tutelage of her high school coach at C.W. Baker in Baldwinsville, N.Y. There, she played with two other current Minutewomen, sophomores Sara MacNabb and Jessica Passanese.

"Athletically, I would have to say that my high school coach served as a major influence on my career," Anderson said. "He pulled me up to varsity in eighth grade and never put me down. After I didn't make the national team my sophomore year, he kept my heart in the game and now here I am."

Growing up with her mother and brother, Anderson looked to both and saw people that influenced her to do things to the fullest.

"My brother was older and played lacrosse, so I always wanted to beat him and get better," Anderson said. "My mother stayed strong as she raised us and I've definitely become a better person because of that."

I've think that I've been able to grow into this system by playing a lot smarter," Anderson said. "In high school In was run and gun. Now I have to look for my teammates a lot more and be more of a team player."

Anderson's passion for the game has enabled her to adjust well to the quickened pace of the college level, as she has used her communication skills and foresight to see things as they're happening as opposed to noticing consequences after the fact.

"As the youngest captain, I think I was able to play an important role with the freshmen," Anderson said. "I'm very open and I like to joke around, especially with the newer players. I think they can see my love for the game and the way I look forward to practice, trying to stay excited for each new day.

"Next year, I hope to step up even more, specifically by being more vocal," Anderson said. "The difference between myself and the seniors was that I came from a stricter lacrosse background. I hope to be a strong leader in a run for NCAAs."

Anderson has had little trouble staying motivated. Whether it was making sectionals in high school or shooting for a place in the NCAA tournament next season, she knows there is always another step to take.

"Here, I can always think about the high levels that you can get to, like the U.S. [National] Team or the NCAAs," Anderson said. "I would love to ever even have the possibility of reaching those spots. It's exciting as I grow along with the program."

Despite Anderson's inspired play this season, there were tough losses and hard times, including close defeats to Syracuse and to Boston University in the season finale.

"When we lose, I just want to come back even harder," Anderson said, "I want to take it to the next team like they took it to us. Syracuse was a game we should've won and we were out for blood after that. I think that we're a good team at coming back and not giving up.

UMass has progressively become a team that can win the close games. After going 4–10 and 6–7 the last two years, the Minutewomen jumped to 9–5 this season.

"When we win, we want to play as close to perfection as possible," Anderson. "I don't think I've ever had my best game yet. I think it's always ahead of you. If the team is playing well, I want to be part of that. We worked well as a team, and I think that was the best part. Playing as a team with a positive attitude."

Even if we didn't end up putting the pieces we had together to form the puzzle we would be ready for the next game. Starting with our win at Harvard, we were just ecstatic. Late in the season, things get repetitive and we started to get a little worn out. I guess you could say the biggest disappointment was the schedule."

Anderson was able to keep the Minutewomen defense going in games where the opposing attack seemed to become relentless.

"I had to become better at my one–on–one defense," Anderson said. "Usually I had to play slide and help but this year I was able to play a role In holding some of the top scorers to either one or no goals at all.

"Trusting teammates is something I've gained while at college. There's a lot of group support and I try not to let my head get down and lead by example."

During the season, Anderson was often forced to rely on her speed and that's were her running came in handy.

"I like being the "last resort" person," Anderson said. "I play midfield so [sophomore defenseman] Lynne Young or Jessica are usually the last players, but coming from behind I can help out a lot. It's all about running."

Anderson knows that as the competition stiffens and the stakes rise as in the NCAA tournament, there will be no room for mental breakdowns.

"Herker's speed, Amy's toughness and Bowen's smarts will have to be replaced, but we have the potential leadership to set our own standards," Anderson said. "I'll have to step up my own skill level. I want to have my best season ever and I don't ever want to level out."

Anderson speaks confidently as she contemplates the high expectations that will inevitably roll around with next spring.

"Francesca has been saying 'go home or go hard.' I think that will be our motto for next year. I will definitely be hard but things that are easy are not very fun."

Irish swimmer Michelle Smith denies tampering with drug test

By Robert Millward
Associated Press

DUBLIN, Ireland — Triple Olympic gold medalist Michelle Smith, again the focus of drug accusations, defiantly denied tampering with a urine sample that may have shown signs of a banned substance.

The Irish swimmer, whose success at the Atlanta Games was tainted by rumors of drug-taking although she has never tested positive, vowed yesterday to fight the latest charges.

"I have no intention of taking this lying down and I have no intention of being bullied by any organization — national or international," Smith told a news conference yesterday.

"I am innocent of these charges, I am appalled at the manner in which they have been leaked into the public domain, and I intend fully defending them, if necessary, all to the way to the International Sports Court in Switzerland," she said.

"I hope my good name and reputation and the good name and reputation of Ireland will win out after this unfortunate saga."

After reading her statement, she declined to answer questions. FINA, the international swimming federation, said Smith is being investigated for "possible manipulation" of an out-of-competition drug test taken at her home in Kilkenny, Ireland, on Jan. 10. The world championships were being held in Perth, Australia, at that time, but Smith skipped them, citing injuries.

FINA honorary secretary Gunnar Werner said in Sydney, Australia, that no drugs were found in the sample, although it did contain "something special." He did not elaborate.

Werner said Smith had 14 days to respond and may request a test on the B sample, taken at the same time as the disputed A sample. He would not elaborate on the manner of the alleged tampering but said it was the first such case he knew of in international swimming.

If found guilty of tampering, Smith could face a suspension or even a lifetime ban.

Werner described the Smith case as "disappointing for our sport" but he stressed that she has "not yet been punished or found guilty. We have to find her guilty first."

At the Atlanta Olympics, Smith won gold medals in the 400-meter freestyle, 200 individual medley and 400 individual medley, and a bronze in the 200 butterfly. Swimmers from other nations, including American star Janet Evans, raised suspicions about Smith, who rose to prominence despite coming from a country that does not have an Olympic-sized pool.

Last August, she captured two gold and two silver medals at the European Swimming Championships in Seville, Spain.

Although FINA made no mention of any drugs being found in the sample, Smith said the laboratory analysis mentioned the presence of "some metabolic precursor of testosterone."

Smith was flanked at the news conference by her lawyer, Peter Lennon, and her husband, Erik De Bruin. A former discus thrower and shot putter, De Bruin served a four-year ban after testing positive for testosterone.

She said the results of the lab test showed a considerable drop in specific gravity, a measure of density, compared to when the sample was tested before it left her home. FINA said that suggested tampering.

Lennon said if the sample had been tampered with, it must have been after it had been taken from Smith's home.

"We want to know how the test was carried out, in what temperature and what happened to the sample after it left her home," he said.

Bailey–Johnson rematch could happen

By Bert Rosenthal
Associated Press

NEW YORK — The ballyhooed match race between Michael Johnson and Donovan Bailey, which proved a bust last year, could be held again this summer as part of the Goodwill Games in New York.

Harvey Schiller, president of Turner Sports, which will televise the Goodwill Games, said there was a "good possibility" of a rematch of the 150-meter showdown at Toronto, where Johnson pulled up injured after 70 meters.

Schiller said that while there are many details to be arranged, the race could be set in a few weeks.

"Both are competitive people and they like the excitement of it," Schiller said. "I don't think there's a downside. Both are running very fast."

Johnson is the 1996 Olympic 200-meter and 400-meter champion and 200 world record-holder. Bailey is the 1996 100 gold medalist and world record-holder.

The track and field portion of the Goodwill Games will be held July 19-22 in Long Island, with Johnson trying to duplicate his Olympic double in the 200 and 400 and Bailey running in the 100. Schiller said the rematch probably would be held near the Aug. 2 end of the games.

He said Mitchel Field in Long Island and Times Square were being considered as sites.

Brad Hunt, Johnson's agent, and Ray Flynn, Johnson's agent, are enthusiastic about the rematch, with the logical distance again 150 meters.

Hunt, however, said Johnson would not consider a two-man race nor a race on a temporary track.

"If they want to put on a race, he would have to have the best guys in the world, about four or five, or even fill the (eight) lanes," Hunt said.

"How can you have a race without Ato Boldon, Maurice Greene or Frankie Fredericks? If they want a race at this point in time that has meaning, you have to include those guys. If it's two men, it's two men other than Michael Johnson."

Boldon is the world 200 champion and has run the 100 this year in 9.86 seconds, only .02 seconds off Bailey's record of 9.84 set at Atlanta. Greene won the world 100m title last year, also at 9.86, and Fredericks was ranked No. 1 in the world in the 100 in 1997.

"Michael needs all the legitimacy of a real track," Hunt said. He said Johnson wouldn't compete on a temporary surface over a road or on concrete.

"I would like to see anything happen that TV embraces and showcases track and field," Hunt added. "Last year's race delivered higher ratings than most sports events."

Flynn said Bailey would be "absolutely" agreeable to a rematch "if the money is right."

Last year, Johnson and Bailey were guaranteed $500,000 apiece, with the winner at SkyDome getting an additional $1 million. A Toronto developer, Edward Cogan, had to step in at the last minute to rescue the race billed as the One to One Challenge of Champions after the meet promoter failed to produce enough money.

"I think the Goodwill Games would be a great podium to do the rematch," Flynn said. "It would stir up a lot of interest. It caught everyone's attention even though there was criticism because Michael pulled up and that was the worst thing that could have happened.

"But I think we would have a terrific race with the two biggest names in track and field. It would be the right matchup to put the global stamp on these games."

Goodwill Games spokesman Mike Lewellen emphasized that such elements as money, location and competitors must be in place before the race can go forward.

He said the athletes would have to be paid at least as much as they were in Toronto. He added that the Long Island venue would make the most sense from a purely running standpoint but a straightaway dash — unlike the curve in Toronto — in Times Square in Manhattan would be more exciting.

"So if we don't solve all the variables, it won't happen," he said.

Galas and Osier provide one–two punch for UM

Leadoff duo have set records for '98 team

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

One of these Minutewomen is not like the other, one of these Minutewomen is just not the same.

Not likely — especially when junior Mandy Galas and senior co-captain Tracy Osier of the No. 24 Massachusetts softball team (36–12) are brought into the equation.

Virtually indistinguishable since the first time they took the field together, Galas and Osier have often been mistaken for one another. Whether it is a fan or even Minutewoman coach Elaine Sortino at times, when either member of arguably the best one–two combination in the Northeast Region steps up to the plate, it is tough to tell them apart.

Their congruent slap–hitting and baserunning styles mesh together with an almost ominous sisterly facial similarity to form a curious syndrome — are they Twins, or a Sister Act?

Well, if they were Twins, then this question literally begs to be asked: which Minutewoman would be Danny DeVito, and which one would be Arnold Schwarzenegger?

Going into the Atlantic 10 Championships held this weekend in Kingston, R.I., Galas and Osier boast a combined .757 batting average and 38 RBI to their credit. While the duo are not true powerhouses at the plate (I.e. Schwarzenegger), they certainly are not DNA–defective (i.e. DeVito) when it comes to doing their jobs: creating RBI opportunities from the first and second spots in the lineup.

Consequently, that theory can be crossed off.

Well, if they were a Sister Act, then their careers would have disappeared into thin air like a Ghost after a two–hit wonder performance — like Whoopi Goldberg.

After helping the team reach the Women's College World Series last season, Galas and Osier have not made cameo appearances on the base paths this season. Last weekend against Temple, Galas set the new UMass single–season record for runs scored (52), while Osier has already eclipsed her own single–season record for steals in — yes, Ghost–like baserunning fashion.

The career record books will have to be rewritten as well, as Osier has further solidified her place as the best basetealer in UMass history with 97, while Galas is third best

NCAA lax tournament shaping up

Lacrosse teams have one week of battle before 12– team field announced

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

With only a week left in the regular–season, speculation has already begun about the NCAA Division I men's lacrosse tournament.

Pairings won't be announced until this Sunday, but here's a look at what lies ahead for the teams that are definitely in, the teams that have good chances and the bubble teams that are competing for spots in the tournament, which begins May 9–10.

Princeton, Maryland, Loyola, Johns Hopkins, Duke, Virginia and Syracuse are definitely in. Where they stack up as far as seeds are concerned, however, is a different story. Princeton and Maryland have vied for the top spot in national polls all season, and the current issues of Faceoff Lacrosse Magazine and STX/USILA have split the difference between the two. Faceoff has the Tigers at No. 1 and Maryland at the No. 2 spot, while the USILA poll has the reverse.

Scott Diggs

Princeton, led by the virtually unstoppable senior trio of Chris Massey, Jon Hess and Jason Hubbard, has a 10–1 record through April 28 and its fourth–straight Ivy League title thanks to a 17–8 drubbing of Pennsylvania on Tuesday. The Terrapins had recorded a 11–1 mark through Monday.

Regardless, expect those two to secure half of the top seeds. The other top seeds should go to Loyola and Johns Hopkins, provided nothing out of the ordinary happens in this last week of action. The Greyhounds, who feature talent in the form of Todd Vizzcarondo, Gewas Schindler, and defenseman Jamie Hanford, have only blemish on their 11–1 record and the Blue Jays, who currently hold the No. 3 spot in the USILA poll breezed by Towson Saturday to up their record to 10–2.

The next four spots belong to — in no certain order — Virginia, Duke, Syracuse and either Hofstra or Georgetown. The Hoyas have put together a strong season, and their 8–3 record has gained them a No. 8 ranking, just one step ahead of the Flying Dutchmen. Either way, both teams will receive a berth to the postseason.

The interesting debate surrounds the maybes and the bubble teams, a group among which the Massachusetts men's team currently sits. UMass (7–4), Hobart (9–3), Harvard (9–3) and Butler (11–3) are the top contenders for the remaining spots. Butler is pretty much a lock, considering the tournament selection committee will take a team from the west and because of its current situation, Notre Dame will likely watch this year's action from home.

Harvard, which is sparked by the senior leadership of captain Mike Ferrucci, does have a record that could sit well with the committee, but its nine wins have come against inconsistent competition. The Crimson's biggest win has come against the Minutemen, a 13–12 victory that came on a questionable goal with 12 seconds remaining. The next best win the Crimson can claim is over the Fighting Irish. Granted their losses are to a couple of quality clubs: Princeton, Duke and Hobart. But Harvard is by no means guaranteed a berth.

Hobart, on the other hand, has a killer schedule to end the season. The Statesmen were on the road yesterday to take on Syracuse at the Carrier Dome, and on May 2 they will host Princeton. That does not exactly bode well for a team that has dropped its last two games: a 19–6 contest against the Blue Devils and a 15–11 tilt against Georgetown.

Consider that at 9–3 Hobart does have wins over Harvard, and Notre Dame, however the tough late season slate might work against the Statesmen's chances.

COURTESY SYRACUSE MEDIA RELATIONS

Matt Cutia may sometimes be overshadowed by his famous teammates, but he could prove valuable to the Orangemen's tournament hopes.

UMass is not out of the mix, even though its 12–3 loss to the Orangemen dropped the Minutemen slightly in the polls. Currently at No. 13 in the USILA sequence, UMass has one game remaining, a 2 p.m. contest against Brown at Richard F. Garber Field (the game was originally scheduled for Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium).

What could help the Minutemen, besides a win over the 3– 9 Bears, is the fact that the North site for the NCAA's first– round games is McGuirk Stadium (hence this weekend's move so as not to ruin the field should the expected inclement weather come). Keep in mind that the Minutemen have only lost two games on the road — a tough feat considering the strength of its schedule — and one of those was a close game against Loyola in Baltimore. Also remember that all four of UMass' losses have come against either tournament–bound or tournament–likely teams.

COURTESY HARVARD MEDIA RELATIONS

Mike Ferrucci

The next group of teams, the precarious bubble–sitters, are North Carolina, Drexel and Penn State. The Tar Heels, because of the strength of their conference, should not make travel reservations. Their 6–7 record, as of Monday, and the fact that three other Atlantic Coast Conference teams will make tourney appearances, will keep them in Chapel Hill.

Drexel could make the biggest stink if not included in the NCAA field. But truth be told, its 11 wins have come against less–than–top–tier clubs and its 13–5 loss to Hofstra proved the Dragons have weaknesses.

Penn State stands at 6–5, but with the records and quality schedules of the teams ranked ahead, the Nittany Lions will probably be left out.

The 12–team field will be announced this Sunday afternoon. First round games will be at McGuirk Alumni Stadium at UMass (North site) and Homewood Field at Johns Hopkins (South site). Second round action will be at Hofstra (North) and Maryland (South), with a final four at Rutgers, May 23–25.

Anderson's experience key for future of lax

By Jamie Jee
Collegian Staff

Raise your hand if you like to run.

Now, it may not be up, but if your name was Melissa Anderson and you were a member of the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team, it would be.

"In high school, I played soccer, lacrosse, and ran indoor track," Anderson said. "Running is a big part of my life. Me and [sophomore midfielder Stephanie] Pavlick, we just run. We say that to each other all the time. Let's run."

UMass coach Francesca McClellan has described Anderson as having "rocket speed," serving as a midfielder who can play excellent defense and score when necessary.

"[Anderson] really made this year exciting," McClellan said. "She stepped up her game and was able to play well on both ends."

Anderson did just that in every game and her presence was invaluable to the success the women's lacrosse team experienced this year. Traditionally, Anderson has focused on the defensive aspect of her game, but this year expanded her range, as she finished with 11 goals and two assists.

Earlier this year against Vermont, Anderson sparked the Minutewomen to a 17–4 rout of the Catamounts after Vermont had tied the score 3–3. Anderson scored and UMass never looked back. Against New Hampshire, Anderson put her offensive potential to good use, scoring three second–half goals to propel her team to an 8–4 win.

Killing of three Serbs increases tensions

PRISTINA, Yugoslavia (AP) — Hundreds of Serb riot police turned back Albanian students trying to enter the main university yesterday — despite an earlier agreement allowing their return after nearly 10 years. News of the killing of three Serbs by Albanian militants added to tensions.

Yesterday's standoff between the ethnic Albanians and Serb police in the southern Yugoslav province lasted about 30 minutes before the students dispersed.

The students were turned away despite a Serb-Albanian agreement last month to permit Albanians to return to university premises they have boycotted for nearly a decade to protest Serbian rule. Ethnic Albanians outnumber Serbs 9-to-1 in Kosovo, but Serbs consider the area vital to their identity. Serbia dominates what remains of Yugoslavia, which also includes Montenegro.

According the agreement, ethnic Albanian students, who had responded to Serbia's abolition of Kosovo's authority in 1989 by setting up underground university classes, were to gradually return to the official Serb university premises in Pristina, the Kosovo capital.

United, Delta make global alliance

CHICAGO (AP) — United Airlines and Delta Air Lines agreed yesterday to an alliance that would control more than one out of every three seats on U.S. airlines.

The Delta-United deal would link the two airlines' route systems, tie together their frequent flier programs, allow qualifying passengers access to each other's airport club rooms and permit selling seats on each other's planes.

"We believe that alliances are the competitive wave of the aviation future... because our customers and the global economy will settle for nothing less," said Gerald Greenwald, United's chairman and chief executive.

United, the nation's leading carrier, is strongest in the Midwest and West. Delta, the No. 3 carrier, has strong operations along the Eastern Seaboard and in the South. The airlines estimate full implementation of the alliance could bring in $600 million in new revenue.

The deal still is subject to the approval of both carriers' pilot unions. Moreover, the Justice Department has said it will examine the pact, along with a wave of alliances announced recently by other U.S. carriers, for its potential effect on consumers.

"We're going to look at them from a narrow view, a broad view, a side view, any view it takes," said John Nannes, deputy assistant attorney general for the Justice Department's antitrust division at a House subcommittee hearing yesterday.

Measures being taken to stop Hobart Hoe–Down

KEN MC DONALD / COLLEGIAN

Paul Bergagni, a junior civil engineering major, relaxes at Hobart Lane.

By Paul Hayes

AMHERST — Town police and officials are taking every precaution they can to prevent the "Hobart Hoe–Down" party from taking place, despite Hobart residents claims that there will not be a Hoe–Down this year.

Eva Schiffer, a Select Board and Town Problem Solving Partnership member, said that measures are going to be taken over the next two weekends to ensure that a repeat of previous Hoe–Downs does not occur. These measures include erecting temporary fencing around some apartments, maintaining a police checkpoint, and eliminating six street– side parking spaces on Hobart Lane.

"We're not trying to prevent legitimate parties," Schiffer said. "But [the Hoe–Down] is not a normal party."

Community policing measures

According to Schiffer, these measures were decided at a Problem Solving Partnership meeting Wednesday night. The partnership is funded by a community policing grant, and its purpose is to address alcohol–related problems between the town and the university.

The police will operate a checkpoint at the fencing around the Gilreath Manor apartments on Hobart Lane, for the next two weekends. Police will let only residents and expected guests to pass by. The partnership has been in contact with residents of Hobart Lane, and has an indication of which ones are expecting to have parties this weekend, Schiffer said.

"Where no guests are expected, none will be admitted," Schiffer said.

The fencing was rented to be placed around Gilreath Manor, by Gilreath's landlord Peter Grandonico.

Schiffer also said that under existing leases, the apartments on Hobart Lane have a maximum occupancy rate which can also be enforced by police.

Wendy Jones Keenan of D.H Jones, which owns all the houses on the right side of Hobart Lane across from Gilreath Manor, said no further action will be taken regarding their properties.

Keenan said that Arrow Security of Springfield has patrolled Hobart Lane for the past three weeks. They have been monitoring D.H. Jones' properties for any potential problems, including noise violations and incidents which could pose a real danger to surrounding residents.

According to Keenan, the security has been very successful, and has resulted in noise complaints and eventual eviction against two separate houses.

A towing company is also on call, and will tow any car found parked on the lawn of a Jones owned property.

No plans for Hobart Hoe–Down

Many residents of Hobart Lane feel they are being treated unfairly, and said that if town officials had attempted to contact them directly, they would have found out there were no plans to have a Hoe–Down.

Craig Edwards, of 20 Hobart Lane (a part of Gilreath Manor), said no one he knows on Hobart Lane has mentioned having a Hoe–Down.

"I haven't heard about [the Hoe–Down] from any other students or Hobart residents," Neyla Leslie of 18 Hobart Lane said. "I've only heard it from the University, the police, the town and Lincoln Apartments."

Hobart residents have been sent letters from the police, the select board and the university among others, all warning them not to throw another Hoe–Down. Yet Leslie said all this attention has been unwarranted.

One letter signed by Assistant Dean of Students states that the schools aim is not to ruin the end of Hobart residents semester, but to ensure that it remains a safe time for all students and their neighbors.

The letter from Amherst Police Chief Donald N. Maia was less conciliatory, and was seen as a threat by some Hobart residents. A part of the letter goes as follows:

"Citizens of this community have directed that they wish the injury and destruction associated with the so–called "Hobart Hoe–Down" to stop. I, along with the University of Massachusetts, other town officials, landlords, and residents of the area, wish to inform you that every legal option to end this outrageous behavior will be employed.

The Amherst Police Department will enforce the law, make all appropriate arrests, and prosecute the resulting cases with vigor to ensure a peaceful Spring on Hobart Lane."

Leslie said the students she knew didn't want the Hoe– Down, because it could jeopardize the conclusion of their leases and the return of their security deposits.

"It's unwarranted, It's harassing the students who live [on Hobart Lane]," Leslie said.

Note from the Editor

Dear readers:

The ideas of you and your peers have been stolen.

As many of you may have noticed, yesterday morning a large number of Collegians were removed from their distribution locations on campus. However, the paper was posted on the Internet and distributed to the Campus Center and off–campus locations.

Throughout the day, however, we received numerous calls inquiring where the papers had gone. University of Massachusetts police are currently investigating the incident.

While ours is a free publication, and limits cannot be placed on how many issues readers consume, the idea behind this act is frightening. The Collegian is devoted to objectively covering the wide range of issues which concern the diverse population of this University.

We stand behind our work.

Removing the paper from its points of distribution goes far beyond stealing a stack of newsprint. The words and images presented in this medium are the sum of the student voice. It is your right to be informed of local and campus events. It is your right to speak out and voice your concerns about all aspects concerning the UMass community.

Removing the Collegian is removing the student voice and an impingement of free speech — a Constitutional right.

Should we really be censoring ourselves?

We will continue to be the voice of the undergraduate student body, publishing daily as we have for the past 30 years.

Annual Bowl Day to be held tomorrow

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

The annual Orchard Hill Residential Area Bowl Day, sponsored by the Orchard Hill Area Government (OHAG) and organized with help from the Sylvan Area Government, will take place this Saturday, May 2, from 11 a.m.–6 p.m. in the Orchard Hill "bowl" and the Van Meter Residence Hall basketball courts in celebration of the end of the school year.

The concert is open to the University of Massachusetts community. Everyone is encouraged to attend what is estimated to be the largest spring event on campus, in light of the cancelled Spring Concert.

"In lieu of not having a Spring Concert, [OHAG] is trying to make this one of the largest free events open to the whole campus," said Avi Khanna, ex–governor of OHAG and Secretary of University Policy.

The organized activities include a wide genre of music and hosts of bands. The UMass a cappella group, Meanwhile, will be performing along with Premium, The Mitchells, Busted Fro and the rap group Cocoa Brodaz, formerly known as Smif–n–Wesson.

Orchard Hill is also proud to be presenting Shootyz Groove, a group from New York whose past endeavors includes opening for No Doubt and 311. Actor Tony Lucca, who has appeared on "Malibu Shores" and the "New Mickey Mouse Club," will be making his first appearance for the event. Also, D.J. Big Phil will be performing at various times of the day.

"We've organized a diverse concert in order to appeal to the entire student body," said OHAG officer Katie McLeod.

A total of 85 assistant volunteers, as well as the OHAG Government officers who organized the event, will be working at the event. Orchard Hill students will be provided with access to free food, amusement and free prizes. IDs are required and non–Orchard Hill students will have access to a variety of food vendors. Donations towards the event will be accepted for the benefit of the Jimmy Fund.

Ways to improve the campus image were discussed in a presentation by Patricia Vandenberg, Assistant Vice Chancellor for Communication and Marketing on "New Visual Logo and Themes for UMass" at yesterday's Faculty Senate meeting at the University of Massachusetts.

"Every day UMass is competing — for good students and faculty, funding and contracts. We're trying to create an audience that is predisposed to say 'yes' to UMass," Vandenberg said.

She stressed the importance of clarity and consistency in presenting the UMass image to boost everything from alumni donations to undergraduate admissions applications.

"When you are large and diverse and complex, people communicate about individual schools and programs, and then the university as a whole. What we need to do is go from fragmented to a more integrated way of communication," Vandenberg said.

In the fall of 1996, Chancellor David K. Scott implemented a task force to evaluate the current logos for UMass. They range from the script form used by athletic teams that is the most recognized, to the state seal, the Minuteman and dozens of others. Vandenberg is hoping to create a consistent color scheme and graphic that will make UMass more recognizable to the public.

"There is no graphic treatment used consistently. No immediate visual impact tells you that this [material] comes from UMass. We have been testing a color palette just off primary [colors]," Vandenberg said.

Colors will include a brighter maroon, gold and blue.

Vandenberg would not show any proposed logos to the senate body but said she would present them to individuals in private meetings.

A new logo may be released in as early as this fall.

"We are in a critical stage for making important decisions at UMass," Vandenberg said.

Chancellor David K. Scott was also present at the meeting to congratulate Provost and Vice Chancellor Cora B. Marrett on her recent election to the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. She was one out of only eight administrators in education and sciences to be elected. Scott also mentioned that it has been exactly 40 years since the last election of a UMass administrator to the Academy.

A brief report of Campaign UMass progress was also presented to the senate body with goals for raising private money, expanding and strengthening the base of advocates for the university and strengthening and arts, was established in 1780 by John Adams, who later became the second president of the United States, and other leaders of the young republic.

According to Academy President, Dr. Daniel C. Tosteson, the Academy serves to "cultivate every art and science which may tend to advance the interest, honor, dignity, and happiness of a free, independent and virtuous people," a press release stated.

Entering its third century in existence, the Academy continues to summon the intellectual resources needed to anticipate, examine and confront the critical challenges facing our society.

Marrett, formerly a professor of sociology and Afro-American studies at the University of Wisconsin–Madison since 1974, came to UMass in August of 1997. From 1992- 1996, she was assistant director of the National Science Foundation. There she was the fist person to lead the directorate of social, behavioral and economic sciences.

Besides serving as provost and vice chancellor for academic affairs, Marrett also serves on many national panels and committees, including being an officer of the American Sociological Association.

The award, Marrett said, is in the category of educational leadership and education. As provost and vice chancellor of the University, Marrett is responsible as coordinator for all academic affairs and student programs. "All of the college deans report to the provost," Marrett said.

Marrett is the first University administrator in 40 years elected to the Academy; former UMass president Jean Paul Mather was elected in 1958. This year, besides Marrett, only seven others were elected in the administration category, including Henry S. Bienen, president of Northwestern University.

The American Academy of Arts and Sciences recognizes distinguished professional contributions. The election is the result of an extensive selection process undertaken by current Academy members.

"This came as a surprise to me, I really hadn't expected to get recognition [at this time], I have to admit, my involvement in [the University and student affairs] has been much of my focus," Marrett said.

As a newly elected member to the Academy, Marrett will be formally welcomed to the Academy at an induction ceremony and dinner to be held at the House of the Academy in Cambridge on Oct. 3.

"Such an honor is rare, especially for an administrator, and most especially for an administrator of a public institution. the University is fortunate to have a leading intellectual like Cora Marrett as its chief academic officer," Chancellor David K. Scott said in a press release.

Correction

University of Massachusetts Assistant Dean of Students Paul Vasconcellos was misquoted in yesterday's issue of the Daily Collegian. Regarding the Student Government Association (SGA) meeting discussing the UMass alcohol policy, Vasconcellos said of the Residential Education Alcohol Program (REAP) that students with serious alcohol problems in REAP cannot identify with other students in REAP who have less serious drinking problems. The quote should have read: "If you do have an alcohol problem, why am I here with people who don't have the same kind of issues as I do?"

The Collegian regrets the error.

"Eagads! Could it be?!"
Ahh yeah, it is.

Edwards has also said that Lincoln Real Estate threatened he and other residents of Gilreath Manor with sanctions in the event a Hoe-Down takes place, which he considers unfair.

According to Edwards, a representative from Lincoln Real Estate told he and his roommates that they would be made to keep their lease until August, and their security deposit would not be returned, if a Hoe-Down occurs.

"A roommate of mine asked Lincoln if we would still be [penalized] if we sat in their downtown offices while a Hoe- Down occurred," Edwards said. "Their secretary said yes." Edwards said he is upset by the fact that he will be made to pay if other residents of Hobart Lane not under leases to Lincoln Real Estate decide to participate in a Hoe-Down.

"Even if I'm out of the country, I get screwed," Edwards said.

In a report on Channel 22 News this past Tuesday, Hobart resident Jarrett Brimmer said any word that the Hoe-Down was taking place this weekend was just a rumor, and added that he was not happy about the possible financial ramifications of a Hoe-Down.

"I'm not looking to pay an excessive amount of fines," Brimmer said.

Edwards said the media attention being given to the Hoe- Down could cause people to show up for the event, even though no one is planning it. As a result, the town could create a problem where they are trying to prevent one.

But Select Board and Partnership Committee member Hill Boss said that the Committee had heard from a number of sources that a Hoe-Down would occur.

"It always has occurred in the past," Boss said. "If there's not one this year, it's precisely because of all the attention we have given it."

A good start

Don't mess with Texas

So, you want to go on a road trip, do you? Partake in an age-old tradition among college students. Grab your battered copy of On the Road and chase down the spirit of Jack Kerouac; hop in your convertible and let the wind blow through your hair while you try to catch all the notable sights on Route 66. Sounds like a great idea.

I was once an innocent believer in the ethereal possibilities that a cross-country jaunt held. The thought of travelling to California with two of my best friends in tow, getting to know each other and our country — what could have been better? Not once did we bat an eyelash at the warnings of our parents; we weren't scared.

Then we got to Texas.

Elsa Allen

We had been warned by people who had gone before us and made it back. "Driving through Texas sucks," they told us. But once again, we didn't listen. We can do it, we thought, we've made it this far. It was the fastest route to New Mexico and we were on our way. Fueled by bottles of Diet Coke and several bags of Lay's Tangy Red Pepper Grill potato chips, we were set, but obviously not nourished well enough to be thinking straight.

"We'll drive straight through the night," we said. "If we can't see Texas, then it can't be that bad, right?"

All agreed, we got in the car and headed towards Amarillo.

Around midnight the rain began. Lightly at first, then heavier. It pelted down, making driving rather treacherous for my friend Robyn, who was unlucky enough to receive this shift. Then came the lightning. I never thought much about what the gates of hell might look like, but now I think I may have an idea. Lightning bolts broke through the dark, empty skyline. The bolts began to get closer, until we could actually hear the crackling of the seared fields that the lightning was destroying. It wasn't until a bolt of lightning crashed down just feet in front of our precious Volvo that we realized it might be a good idea to pull over for a bit and re-assess our situation.

We didn't know where we were. Somewhere in the middle of Texas is the closest I can come to describing our location. We reached a little strip of a town and pulled into an all- night gas station, the Taylor Food Mart. Stumbling out of the car, shaking from the realization of how close we had come to actually being struck by lightning, we sought refuge inside.

Sitting unassumingly at a table in the corner was an old man. He informed us that tornadoes were approaching. Nothing at the time made us question why he was sitting in a gas station at midnight, with tornadoes bearing down on the town, instead of being in the safety of his storm cellar. He began to talk to us.

This man, a car salesman from Childress, TX, began to spin tales of tornadoes that had hit the town in the previous weeks. Hail the size of bowling balls, 13 people who were still missing in the debris of houses that had been picked up and thrown around, six inches of crickets falling from the sky.

"Crickets?" we questioned.

"Crickets," he affirmed.

Somehow he managed to incorporate a story about how he hit a road-runner on the highway and had to pry it from the front grill of his car — but only after he had driven around with the feet sticking precariously from his headlights. This was indeed a scary man.

Robyn was crying.

"I don't want to die," she said. "And I hate crickets."

Realizing that we couldn't continue on that night, we were forced to find accommodations. Our car dealer friend, after kindly offering to let us stay at his house (an offer we immediately declined when we realized that this man appeared to be getting his jollies from frightening us), proceeded to follow us in his car as we made a desperate search for a hotel. He tailed us, flashing his high beams and beckoning for us to follow him. By this time we were terrified.

We were forced to check into Childress County's equivalent to the Bates Motel (flashing "motel" sign, hourly rates, parking lot full of big rigs.) The hotel clerk, Rufus Gibbs, clad in his PJs and none to happy to be dealing with three girls from Massachusetts at 1 a.m., gave us the key to our deluxe room. We made our way through the maze of 18-wheelers that filled the parking lot, and parked our suburban-looking, "Hi, we're from out of town, come and rob us" car close to the door, in case a quick getaway was in order. The rain continued to pelt down, and lightning struck haphazardly around us.

We ran to the room, slammed the door, moved the heaviest piece of furniture in front of it, and only then felt relatively at ease. After knocking back a few shots of Captain Morgan's, and reflecting on our night, we decided the best thing to do would be to sleep together in one bed with a kitchen knife (the closest thing we had to a weapon) under our pillows. I fell asleep imagining that at any moment the car salesman would crash through our door with an ax, a crazed look in his eyes as he chopped us up, mumbling things about crickets and hail.

The next morning, finding ourselves still in one piece, we packed up the car in record time. Rufus Gibbs watched from the lobby window, bearing his three teeth in a sinister grin. I was behind the wheel. We tore out of the parking lot and proceeded to get the hell out of Texas, leaving the tornadoes, car salesman, Rufus Gibbs and the crickets in our dusty wake, never to return again.

The next 50 years

Yesterday the state of Israel celebrated the 50th anniversary of its first prime minister, David Ben Gurion, reading the Declaration of Independence. Like India, which celebrated 50 years of independence in 1997, this anniversary is being greeted with mixed reactions.

Bryan Schwartzman

In many ways 50 years is an arbitrary number; neither India nor Israel will change radically from when they were 49. Yet a golden anniversary seems like a particularly poignant time to ask hard questions about nationhood. With an impending celebration, the obvious question will be asked: are the accomplishments of the first 50 years worth celebrating?

India and Israel were both granted independence in the aftermath of World War II. Both states were founded on idealistic expectations and today, both nations have exceptionally politically divided populations. Yet this is where the similarity ends. To understand the state of Israel, one has to address the concept of Zionism. Whether or not the state of Israel is a success story is very much the same question as whether Zionism as an idea is a success story.

One hundred years ago, Theodore Hertzel founded the movement of Zionism, publishing a book advocating for a sovereign Jewish entity and organizing an international congress which later became the World Zionist Organization. Zionism was based as much in socialism as in the idea that members of a society should share everything and profit equally, as it was in the Torah and the idea that Palestine was the "Promised Land."

The movement was originally intended to encompass European Jews, but would later claim the "law of return" for Jews from all around the world. The cultural gap between Jews of European decent and Jews of Middle Eastern and African descent has been one of the most difficult obstacles towards the realization of the idealistic goals of the nation.

Zionism resurrected the biblical language of Hebrew, modernizing the language and creating a new culture which was part European and part Middle Eastern. With the increase of Jewish immigrants into the British Mandate of Palestine comes one of the most debated historical issues of the 20th century: did the Jewish settlers displace the Arabs who inhabited the land the way we displaced Native Americans?

Zionism has had to deal with the charge that it is a racist ideology and stems from the madness of European colonialism. Zionism was the result of a desperate people empowering themselves and taking control of their destiny. It is the combination of modern political thought and Torah interpretation.

So the answer to whether the state of Israel is a success is yes... and no. When independence was declared, less than 600,000 Jews lived in Israel; today the number is more than six million, or roughly half of the world's Jewry. It has the overwhelming support of the world's Jewry, and is a secure place to emigrate.

The per capita income of Israel's citizens has reached the European average. Technology is growing at a rapid pace; Israel has become known as the "Silicon Valley" of the Middle East. Israel has developed a unique culture, and is visited by more and more tourists each year.

Yet why is there a resounding feeling in Israel that this is just another year and there is little reason to rejoice? The Oslo Accords helped create the hope that this generation of Israelis could raise their children in a society where war is not imminent.

This latest standoff between Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu is quite ominous. Arafat is threatening to declare an independent state by 1999 if a final peace agreement is not reached as stipulated in the Oslo Accords. Netanyahu said if Arafat declares independence Israel would respond, making the disappearance of war seem even more improbable.

Fifty years of history should be enough to teach the world that the Jewish presence in the Middle East is permanent, and is not going anywhere. Fifty years should also be enough to teach the Israeli establishment that no group of people deserves to be historically marginalized; no group of people deserves to have their self-determination taken away. A compromise will have to be reached, hopefully sooner rather than later, hopefully not in another 50 years.

We are not living in a Post-Zionist age; the movement of Zionism is still developing as Israel develops. So the answer to Zionism success or failure lies not in the now but in the future.

Public money for private use

To the editor:

Daniel Bodah, in his recent editorial (Collegian, April 28) on corporate rights, made negative reference to University professors who use "public money to develop their private technology corporations." I would like to remind Bodah that, as students attending a public university, we are all making use of public money to further our own private ambitions, most of which revolve around obtaining gainful employment after graduation. Since I assume that Bodah has no complaints against the use of public funds to educate students, thus making them more productive members of the Commonwealth, I ask: what makes the seeding of a technology firm, which provides jobs for our graduates, tax revenue for our state treasury and increases the productivity of our work force, less worthy of public funds?

We are all targets

"Hucked on fonicks werked fer me."

Face it, there is one in every crowd: that kid, that guy that still thinks it's cool to wear the "I'm with stupid" t-shirt.

What concerns me is not the 40-year-old trying to pose as a fan of Lollapalooza 1993 — we all know he took his little boy to see some "grunge" band from Seattle.

How many of the rest of us in the mass of "individuals" are wearing a shirt that says, Abercrombie & Fitch? I have no problem with mall clothing chains; in fact, if I had more money, I would have a hell of a lot more $99 sweaters, and the name of the company does matter.

Ken McDonald

My problem comes with the fact that a lot of people think that it is cool to walk around campus with the name of a store practically tattooed across their chest, or hat, or shorts, or jacket, or... I give up.

We claim to be a generation with no role models: "Generation X." More and more I am seeing that we are bowing down to the altars of Tommy Hilfiger and Calvin Klein. I wonder if anyone realizes that those designers do not even create their clothes anymore; they pay some college graduate no money to do their bidding.

And what do these "geniuses" of Paris, London and New York come up with? A pair of boxers that has a man's name across the top, selling at a price equivalent to the entire year's wages of the sweat-shop baby that worked 16 hours a day to make it.

When you think about it, the fashion industry realizes how stupid we all are. Why would they want to create a cool design or a pattern when they can simply print the name of their boss and reap the rewards?

What are you trying to say by wearing an Abercrombie t-shirt? Maybe you are trying to say, "Hey, look at me. I have the money to afford a $30 t-shirt that isn't original, but I am rich enough to have one." Or maybe, "Hey look at me, I am one of you. I saved my hard-earned cash to be just like Kate Moss, the patron saint of underweight, overpaid models."

Some things are unavoidable: if you go to buy a pair of sneakers, you are going to buy a label one way or the other. Whether it is Zips or Reebok, you will be hard pressed to find an athletic shoe with no visible tie to a company.

Some messages need to be conveyed via clothing. For example, where would the men of America be without "Button your fly?" Isn't the world a better place for having "Go-ed naked" unoriginality? Think of all the wars that have been avoided because of those "Have a nice day" smiley faces.

So much of someone's personality can be determined by what adorns their shirts. You have a pretty good idea what era someone is living in if they are wearing something featuring Def Leppard or the Spice Girls. Also, shirts like "Farfrompukin'" and "Save the whales" give a clue as to the psyche of the person wearing them.

That is why the wisdom of a logo that is so big that it must start on one side of a pair of shorts and continue all the way around to the other side escapes me. My first guess is that it is a not-so-subtle way of mirroring the ignorance of the person wearing it. My second guess is that it is mirroring the ego of the designer. Does anyone even look in the mirror after they dress anymore? I guess not because then it would say, "hctiF & elbmorcreb\."

College students have turned into a programmed culture and it scares me that we are supposed to be the future of America, yet we cannot think for ourselves. It amazes me that we have all these expensive clothes, but have to scrape together our last nickels and dimes to go to Antonio's.

In an era where people are being killed for their sneakers, there seems to be only one finger on the trigger. The assassin's name: Tommy Hilfiger. The targets: your wallets and your identity.

You have been warned.

Man charged with murdering daughter after 'Net confession

By Bob Moen
Associated Press

BISMARCK, N.D. — Of dozens of messages posted every day on the Internet by a support group for problem drinkers, the 165-word message posted at 6:09 a.m. on March 22 stood out.

"Amanda I murdered because her mother stood between us," it said in part.

Two other support group members messaged replies — one offering support, the other asking "What do you mean, you murdered your daughter?"

The author of the original message, posted by "Hroistadl," followed hours later with a 562-word reply detailing a bitter custody fight over Amanda and how "I got wickedly drunk, set our house on fire, went to bed, listened to her scream twice, climbed out the window and set about putting on a show of shock, surprise and grief to remove culpability from myself."

The messages led police to arrest Larry Froistad, a San Diego computer programmer, and charge him with murdering his 5-year-old daughter three years earlier in Bowman, N.D., where Froistad had lived.

The case has set off a debate about the confidentiality of online support groups, where some members may assume that the Intimate stories they send over the Internet are private.

Froistad's attorneys say he will plead innocent at his arraignment today. They contend the messages could have been sent by someone else and are not admissible evidence.

"I know that Larry loved his daughter very much, and at this point we don't believe he's responsible — that this was in fact an accident," said Philip Sokol, a San Diego attorney.

The 1995 fire was ruled an accident.

Neighbor Ralph Simonson recalled that on the night of the fire Froistad was "throwing buckets of water on the house and yelling, 'Amanda, come to the window.'"

Police said Froistad, 29, called and confessed after learning that support group members had notified authorities about his postings.

Jim Shirk, a chemical dependency therapist in Lakebay, Wash., was one of three support group members who notified police of the confession.

"I've listened to and read a lot of people confessing to things and talk about things. After a while you get a feeling for what's real and what's fantasy," Shirk said. "This struck me as being real."

The messages appeared in a support group run by Moderation Management Network Inc. Subscribers from around the world can send and browse e-mail messages.

Shirk said he was called a "fink" and a "snitch" by other members.

"I definitely believe I did the right thing," he said. San Diego police traced the messages to Froistad. The department sent a notice to agencies across the nation asking them to check their records of any fatal fires and Bowman authorities responded. Bowman Police Chief Donald Huso said Froistad called him March 27 and confessed to setting the fire. He was arrested that day. "He prefaced it by saying, 'The memories I have of the fire is that I set the fire,'" Huso said.

If convicted of Class AA murder — the highest murder charge in North Dakota — Froistad faces up to life in prison without the chance for parole. There is no death penalty in North Dakota. Bowman County State's Attorney Steven Wild said he hesitated before reopening the case.

"The e-mail statement alone, there's questions about whether that by itself would give us enough probable cause to issue the complaint and the warrant," he said.

Sokol questioned whether the e-mail messages were admissible evidence and said the confessions could be considered hearsay, coerced and privileged.

And Sokol noted the Bowman fire was ruled an accident.

"Before any statements made by someone can be admitted against them in evidence, there has to be some evidence that there was in fact a crime," he said. "And that remains to be seen at this point."

Sam Dash, a Georgetown University law professor, said an e-mail confession would be no different than someone confessing to a friend or police.

Blair insists that IRA must disarm as part of Belfast peace accord

By Shawn Pogatchnik
Associated Press

BELFAST, Northern Ireland — The Irish Republican Army refused to disarm yesterday as part of the Belfast peace accord, infuriating Protestant leaders who vowed to exclude its allied Sinn Fein party from any new Northern Ireland administration.

Hours later, a car bomb containing more than 600 pounds of explosives forced the evacuation of hundreds of people from shops in Lisburn, a mostly Protestant town southwest of Belfast. The unclaimed bomb, which was safely defused, was the first such attack in Northern Ireland since early February, when opponents of the IRA's 1997 truce bombed two other predominantly Protestant towns.

The IRA called the April 10 accord among the British and Irish governments and eight parties, including Sinn Fein, "significant." But the outlawed group rejected the section requiring Northern Ireland's rival paramilitary groups to "decommission" weaponry, starting in June and finishing within two years.

"Let us make it clear there will be no decommissioning by the IRA," the seven-member command said yesterday in the movement's weekly newspaper, Republican News.

Sinn Fein leader Gerry Adams, a reputed former IRA commander, called the statement balanced.

"People need to calm down. What did people expect the IRA to say?" Adams said.

But British Prime Minister Tony Blair and his governor in Northern Ireland, Mo Mowlam, insisted IRA disarmament was an essential part of the accord.

"It's got to be absolutely clear that people who are going to serve in the government of Northern Ireland have got to have given up violence for good," Blair said in Manchester, a northwest England city devastated by an IRA bomb two years ago.

The crisis came as former U.S. Sen. George Mitchell, who guided 22 months of negotiations to the accord, returned to Belfast to accept an award from the Northern Ireland Chamber of Commerce. Mitchell emphasized that he expects the IRA to honor the part of the agreement specifying that it and the north's pro-British paramilitary groups should disarm by May 2000.

"I believe strongly that there must be the total decommissioning of all paramilitary arms," Mitchell told Ulster Television, adding that it "will eventually happen."

Today in Dublin, Mitchell will have lunch with Irish Prime Minister Bertie Ahern and receive an honorary doctorate from Trinity College.

The unsigned agreement, which must be approved in public referendums May 22 in Northern Ireland and the Irish Republic, would create a new 108-seat Assembly directed by a multi-party Executive.

Tobacco companies deny any involvement in black market

By Laurie Kellman
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Fighting back against tobacco company attacks, Senate Democrats and the Clinton administration accused the industry of fueling a black market for cigarettes. They called for increased enforcement to stop the problem.

"Haven't the tobacco companies been shown to be complicitous in some of the smuggling efforts?" Sen. Richard Durbin (D-Ill.), asked during a Senate Judiciary Committee meeting yesterday. He held up news reports saying that American tobacco companies and employees were involved in smuggling.

"In some cases, there was complicity," replied Lawrence Summers, deputy secretary of the Treasury. "There is no way in our judgment that substantial smuggling of tobacco products could take place without the complicity of those in the industry."

The accusation came as the tobacco industry ratcheted up its anti-Washington advertising campaign with new television spots in 40 cities accusing Congress and the White House of fostering a black market that would increase teen smoking and crime.

The industry plans to add full-page ads in today's national newspapers to their campaign, industry spokesman Scott Williams said.

Williams denied that tobacco executives were instructing their companies to boost a black market.

"They wouldn't support or condone breaking the law," Williams told reporters. "The black market hurts the tobacco companies. They lose sales."

The fight stems from the industry's rejection three weeks ago of Congress' leading tobacco bill, which would require companies to pay $516 billion over 25 years, leading to sharply higher cigarette prices.

The bill grew out of a proposed settlement last year between 40 states, smokers and cigarette makers that would cover some costs of medical care for smokers and limit the tobacco industry's liability in civil lawsuits.

Despite the harsh words, President Clinton asked the companies to come back to the negotiating table so the two sides might agree on a way to reduce teen smoking.

"I would hope that before this is over, they would come back and rejoin the negotiations," Clinton said. "I think it would be better if they were at the table."

He also said lawmakers and political parties should not accept contributions from tobacco companies.

"Until we get this matter resolved with the teen smoking, I think it would be better if none of us did," he said.

Having failed to persuade Congress to reject what it sees as unreasonable legislation, the industry now wants to convince the general public that lawmakers risk creating a black market that would make cigarettes more easily available to children.

Congress' leading tobacco bill, sponsored by Commerce Committee Chairman John McCain, would raise cigarette prices by $1.10 by 2003. That would mean a price of about $3.50 per pack, not enough to encourage a black market, the administration says.

But the tobacco industry and some Wall Street analysts contend the price is far more likely to rise to $5 a pack under McCain's bill. They argue that such a high price would force companies into bankruptcy and set off a chain reaction that would fuel a black market, crime and teenage access to cigarettes.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Orrin Hatch, (R-Utah), agrees that $1.10 is too high. He chastised Summers for basing his opinion on "pathetic" analysis and said more details were needed. To be on the safe side, Summers said, any bill passed by Congress should include funding to beef up enforcement of cigarette sales to "close the chain" of illegal distribution.

He offered no estimate of the cost of increased enforcement and didn't say where the money would come from.

Under the enforcement proposal, which likely will be offered on the McCain bill when it comes to the Senate floor this month, every link in the distribution chain of tobacco products would be licensed. Manufacturers, wholesalers, exporters and importers would receive federal licenses, while retailers would be licensed by states.

The proposal also would require that tobacco products be marked for domestic distribution or for export, to prevent them from being diverted around excise taxes.

Critics, such as Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.), called the proposal naive, saying other areas of the law already are too weak to prevent Mexican cigarettes from crossing the border into her state.

And Williams said the administration's proposal gives credence to the industry.

"The administration just admitted that the threat of a contraband problem is real," he said.

Rogue agent makes phony accusations

By Rob Wells
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Former Senate Majority Leader Howard Baker and two other politicians were targeted with phony criminal allegations by a rogue Internal Revenue Service agent attempting to advance his career, a Senate panel was told yesterday.

"I knew nothing of that investigation, either before or during the time it was going on or after it was terminated, until I was informed by [Senate Finance] Committee staff," Baker said. "The allegations, as related to me, were absolutely and totally without foundation and did not occur," he said. "I must tell you Mr. Chairman, I have never been so infuriated."

Joining Baker, who served as White House chief of staff for President Reagan, were two other targets of the bogus investigation: David Crockett, district attorney general in northeast Tennessee, and the area's longtime congressman, now-retired Rep. James H. Quillen (R-Tenn.).

The rogue agent, whose name was not disclosed, eventually was fired after cocaine was found in his car.

Baker expressed "my profound appreciation" to the three IRS agents who sought to block the rogue agent's 1989 plot. As a result of their intervention, the agents said, they suffered retaliation that led two to retire and the other to be demoted.

Baker and Quillen said they didn't know why they were targeted. Crockett suggested he was the target of retribution because his office unsuccessfully sought to prosecute the rogue agent for drunken driving in Johnson City, Tenn., in the mid-1980s.

The case marked a dramatic conclusion to a third day of Senate Finance Committee oversight hearings into IRS criminal investigators.

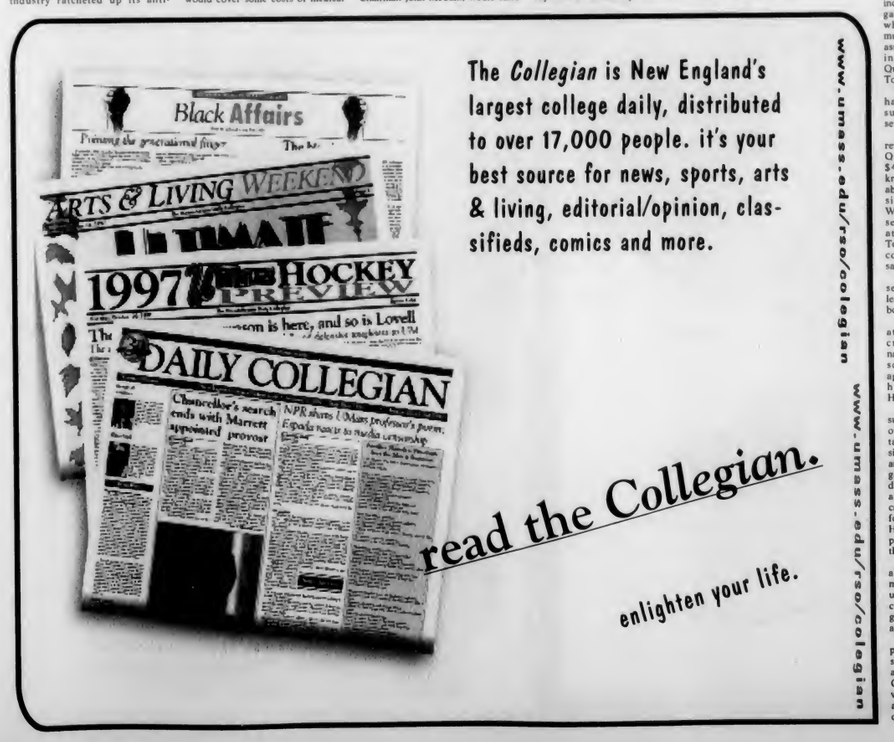
The panel heard four IRS auditors describe several instances in which large corporations and wealthy taxpayers managed to reduce disputed tax bills by millions. In some cases, the witnesses said, settlement was driven by a supervisor's attempt to improve job performance ratings by closing cases quickly. Other cases smacked of favoritism, they said.

Maureen O'Dwyer, an IRS international auditor in New York City, alleged that her supervisors interfered and prematurely closed an audit of a large multinational corporation in which she had recommended repayment of $12 million in back taxes. With penalties, this figure could have reached $24 million.

"My manager, through ambition, incompetence and lack of integrity, gave up a potential tax deficiency which could have brought in as much revenue as $24 million," she asserted. A central figure in derailing the bogus probe of Baker, Quillen and Crockett was IRS agent Tommy A. Henderson.

Henderson testified the plot was hatched by an agent under his supervision who suffered from severe alcohol abuse.

The rogue agent, in an effort to revive his career, alleged Baker and Quillen received as much as $400,000 per month from a well-known national company for "favorable legislation and/or political considerations," Henderson said. Without authorization, the agent sent the information to the U.S. attorney's Office in Greenville, Tenn., and the FBI and attempted to convene a grand jury, Henderson said.



After conferring with another senior agent, Henderson said, "I learned that all the information was bogus.

"What I had uncovered was an attempt to create an unfounded criminal investigation on two national political figures for no reason other than to redeem this agent's own career and ingratiate himself with his supervisors," Henderson said.

Henderson recommended to his superiors the rogue agent be placed on leave, his gun and credentials taken and he should seek professional help. "I was told to sit down and shut up and I was under investigation," he said. Several days after discussing the case with an FBI agent, Henderson said, he was called by his superiors and criticized for his performance as a supervisor. Henderson gave up his supervisory position and now is an agent with the IRS in Florida.

Patricia J. Gernt, a former IRS agent in Tennessee, told the committee the rogue agent made unwanted sexual advances. Her complaint was met with an investigation of her by senior IRS managers, she said.

Gernt, who claimed she was punched in the stomach by an IRS supervisor, filed a complaint and agreed to a settlement. IRS Commissioner Charles O. Rossotti waived the settlement gag order, allowing her to testify about the case.

Redgrave to perform in MIFA

By Emily Trask
Collegian Staff

Gracing stages all over Western Massachusetts this weekend as part of the fifth annual Massachusetts International Festival of the Arts (MIFA), British stage and film actress Vanessa Redgrave will perform the world premiere of Sarah Bernhardt Comes to Town. The performance will be at StageWest in Springfield, on Saturday, May 2 at 8 p.m. and Sunday, May 3 at 2 p.m. and 8 p.m.

Redgrave will be joined by her mother, English actress Rachel Redgrave in this new stage production of recently discovered stories by Anton Chekhov. Sarah Bernhardt Comes to Town is the title of one of the previously unknown short stories by Chekhov. Recently, in the Nov. 1997 issue of Harper's magazine, five of these stories were published for the first time in English. These newly discovered stories, including portraits of some of Redgrave's favorite Chekhov characters will be presented by Redgrave's own Moving Theater company.

On Monday, May 4, Redgrave will also attend a screening of her latest film, Déjà Vu, which was directed by independent American filmmaker Henry Jaglom. At the conclusion of the film, Redgrave will participate in a discussion of the film. The screening will be held at the Academy of Music in Northampton at 8 p.m.

In addition to Redgrave's appearance for the Festival Finale, MIFA will present the grand opening of The General, a screening of Buster Keaton's 1927 classic silent masterpiece, played simultaneously with a new original score composed and performed live by Peter Blanchette and the Virtual consort at Memorial Hall Theater in Shelburne Falls, MA. on Friday and Sunday, May 1-2 at 8 p.m., as well as Sunday, May 3 at 3 p.m. Also on Friday, May 1 at Holyoke Community College will be "The Road to Heaven," a music review by the Valley's own Young at Heart Chorus, a group of veteran professional and amateur performers ranging in age from 62 to 90-something.

One of the highlights of this year's festival to be featured on Sunday, May 3 at 7 p.m. will be the premiere of Patience & Sarah, a new opera by composer Paula M. Kimper and librettist Wende Persons based on Isabel Miller's novel about two pioneering women in the early 19th century. This special MIFA performance is a preview to the opera's fully-staged world premiere at Lincoln Center Festival '98 in New York City in July. Patience & Sarah will be performed at the Academy of Music in Northampton.

Tickets for MIFA '98 are available at the Mullins Center Box Office at the University of Massachusetts (413-545-3073) and at Ticketmaster (in Western Massachusetts is 413-733-2500). Tickets for most events are $20 general admission, $15 for students. $5 for UMass and Hampshire College students. Tickets for Sarah Bernhardt Comes to Town are available only for the Sunday evening performance, at $15 for students or $60 general admission, the higher price for general admission reflecting Redgrave's wish that 200 seats be set aside at a proportionately lower price for students.

Tickets for Deja Vu are available exclusively through the Academy of Music Box Office at (413) 584-1664. 1-6 pm. Regular admission to the film and discussion is $15, preferred tickets at $35 include a champagne reception following the discussion.

Central Area Springfest begins tonight

Come rain or shine this weekend, Central Residential Area will kick-off its annual Central Area Springfest tonight at 6 p.m. The event, which will span the entire weekend, will feature 18 bands and approximately 21 hours worth of music.

The Central Area Springfest was an idea originally conceived by Jason "J-Boy" McIsaac, in conjunction with the Central Area Government.

McIsaac said that he wanted "some kind of institution for unsigned bands;" hence, the Springfest features local bands in an attempt to highlight some of the musical talent in the Pioneer Valley.

In addition to the bands, Springfest will feature a moon bounce, a dunk tank, a slip-and-slide as well as a free, vegetarian-friendly barbecue. All the events and food will be free.

Tonight's program begins with Sick Man Dixon, followed by Scraggy Neck Road and Tuscan Groove. Last year's headlines, Trick Knee and R.K.D.S will also perform tonight.

Central's Battle of the Bands' champion, Kay Jah Funk will start things off at 6:30 p.m. on Saturday. Bluegrau band County Exchange and Space Hippies' will also perform. The Bruce Bass Funkestra, featuring Jam Central, is a 20 piece rhythm machine as well as a popular act from last year. Electric Blue and Cozmic Truth will close out Saturday night.

Sunday's program begins at noon with the January Hills Band, followed by Unit and Chuck. The rap duo of DJ Trends and DJ Storm take the stage next, followed by Ash Men and Hampshire College's Brothermen. Also look for UMass veterans, Sway, to bring the evening to a close.

McIsaac says that the Springfest has grown every year and he expects "a hell of a time."

year. The Minutemen have reached that mark twice (12 against Harvard, Boston College) since reaching the meat of the college lacrosse schedule. Junior goaltender Strider Dickson has started all 12 games this season for the Bears, compiling a 0.600 save percentage, two points better than Kasselakis, a pre-season second team All-American.

On offense, the Bears have been struggling as much as the Minutemen this year, having reached double figures only four times this season. Senior attackman Mike Satin leads the team in scoring (39 points), followed by junior midfielder Jed Dewick's 37 points.

The game was moved to Garber Field after originally being scheduled to be played at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium. Amherst hosts the first round of the lacrosse playoffs at McGuirk and because of inclement weather headed for the Pioneer Valley, administration wants to keep the field in good condition for next weekend.

She also has 64 strikeouts so far this season.

Should UMass win today's game against Virginia Tech, they will play again on Saturday at 12 p.m. versus the winner of today's St. Joseph-Dayton game. The winner of Saturday's game will then go on to play in the championship Sunday. The winner of the championship will face the winner of the America East Tournament on May 7-8 at the NCAA Play-in Series.

Despite the pressure and importance of the tournament, coach Elaine Sortino views playing now as still taking it one game at a time.

"It's the same as any game we've played all year. We're just going to keep doing what we've been doing and we don't look at this as anything different than as we've got a game on Friday," Sortino said. "We have a ball-game to play. That's all it can ever be, it will never be more than that, it will never be less than that, it will always be the same."

career at Cheshire High. No. 8 hit .322 in his rookie year, seeing action in 30 games, 25 of which were starts. However, last year Samela assumed the starting job behind the dish and hit .338 with eight homers and 35 RBI.

This season, however, Samela got off to a slow start, and was hitting .174 after the first 11 games of the year. Since then, Samela has raised his average over 100 points, and has been flirting with the .300 mark over the past few weeks.

"It took a little bit of time to get back into things. I didn't see the ball well and wasn't patient up at the plate," Samela said. "Now I'm seeing the ball well and getting some good hacks at the pitches I want to swing at."

"He's starting to get his balance back. He needs to stay back and use his hands up at the plate," said Stone of his left-handed hitting catcher. "He needs to get into a groove, and some of our other guys are like that too. We're hoping that as a team everyone will peak at the right time."

On the defensive end, Samela is also proving his worth. Last season he threw out around 31 percent of would-be baserunners, a mark which is around a respectable 25 percent this year. And of course, Samela can always be found doing the little things that a catcher needs to do, whether it be blocking balls in the dirt or working with his pitchers.

"He's done a good job as a catcher as well as a good job with our pitchers. For catching every game without any relief, especially with all of the doubleheaders and back-to- back games that we've had, he's done a great job," Stone said.

But for now, the Connecticut native, who was shunned away by his home state school, will lead a border rival into the final week of the regular season and the A-10 Tournament.

"Coming here was the best decision in my life. There's not one bad thing that I can say about UMass," Samela said. "The program is great, and Mike Stone is one of the best coaches that I've ever played for. I would never want to go somewhere else.

"I don't think we've played close to our best game yet. This team has a lot of character. There's a lot of different personalities that seem to gel," continued Samela. "That's what it takes to win. Hopefully we'll start peaking now heading into the A-10 Tournament."

And surely Samela will continue to go all-out in order to see UMass come out as conference champions.

The 400m hurdles
Neil Concepcion ran a 54.04 at the UMass Quad and is seeded second this spring behind Virginia Tech's Kevin Walker.

The javelin and discus
Sophomore Vic Morency is ranked first in both events as he became the first UMass athlete to win an event at the Penn Relays.

The pole vault
UMass' Albie Vazquez has been atop the A-10 all season.

less than first only once at Connecticut on April 18. The Mlt should be a neck-and-neck duel between Virginia Tech and the Minutewomen.

The javelin
Sharyn Harrison is ranked No. 1 and should bring home the gold. The Hokies will probably fill in after that.

The 400 hurdles
Silifa Kenku holds the school record with a time of 61.21 while Chrystal Murphy is also looking to grab some points.

The 3000m
Senior captain Rebecca Donaghue leads the way in a time of 9:47. It should be a "bloody battle" with Terry Carroll as she has recorded a 9:48. Christy Martin might also push for the fourth slot as she is ranked fourth (10:12). Sally Hirsh should round out the field with a possible sixth place finish.

The 5000m
While the Explorers and the Hawks look to capture the top spots, Hirsch is will return to the track to see if she can retain her third place ranking this season. the Hokies are the only two teams to have broken 48 seconds.

Incentive for UM lax win

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

A month or so back, when the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team was riding high at 6-0, only a myopic final stretch would force a must-win situation into the Minutemen's hands. But four losses in five games has put the Minutemen in exactly that.

Tomorrow at Richard F. Garber Field at 2 p.m., nine seniors will fight for their collective lives with their backs against the wall in what could be their final game in a UMass uniform.

"We know what we have to do," senior co-captain Harold Drumm said. "If things don't go our way, we go home."

The Minutemen (7-4) will undoubtedly need a victory to have even a chance in making their 14th NCAA Tournament appearance. Brown comes in at 3-9, with all three wins coming on the road. Last year, similarly, Brown tried to ruin the Minutemen's season, with their own playoff hopes dashed. Instead, the Minutemen assured a place in the tournament by coming out victorious.

"Brown's going to come in very loose," coach Greg Cannella said. "They know their destiny. There's no pressure on them. The seniors are going to want to go out on the right note."

A win would give the Minutemen a strong case for an NCAA berth, having lost to three tournament-bound teams and one bubble-team on a last second goal. Meanwhile, some help would be much appreciated to extend the season for certain.

Brown comes to the table having played one of the nation's toughest schedules. Despite their hapless record, Brown has fought tough against Princeton (9-6), Syracuse (14-8), and Loyola (14-8). Neither Cannella or the team is taking the Bears for granted.

"The New England rivalry that we have is great. They've played us tough in the past, and this weekend, they're playing for pride," said goalie John Kanelakis. "If they win, they can say to themselves 'we didn't have a great season, but we played spoiler to UMass.' That's all they need for motivation."

Brown leads the all-time series 20-16, while the Minutemen have taken the last two. The Bears have not won a regular season game in Amherst since a 13-12 decision in the 1991 season.

"Practice has been great," senior Mike DelPercio said. "We all know what's at stake. We need to possess the ball on offense by limiting our turnovers. If we do that, we should be all right."

The sputtering Minuteman will have plenty of opportunities to take advantage of a porous Brown defense, which is allowing nearly 12 goals a game this

UM will try repeat at A-10's

By Jackie Leroux
Collegian Staff

The No. 24 Massachusetts softball team has won 10 Atlantic-10 Tournament titles, including the last three straight. Starting today, it will begin its quest for number 11.

For the eighth straight year, UMass (37-12, 15-1 A-10) is the top seed in the tournament. At noon today, it will face off with No. 4 Virginia Tech (30-29, 8-8).

"I feel very good about our chances this weekend," senior centerfielder Tracey Osier said. "With our last two double headers against Temple and B.C., the team really fought hard to get those wins. We're really starting to come together and at this time of the season, it is real encouraging to see."

The Hokies certainly have their work cut out for them. First of all, they will have to contend with Minutewoman junior pitcher Danielle Henderson. For the second straight season, Henderson has been named the A-10 Pitcher of the Year and has become one of the top pitchers in the nation this season.

She leads the country in strikeouts per game, averaging 11.8, while her earned run average of 0.65 currently ranks her seventh in the country. Last year's tournament participants are sure to remember her well as she set new tournament records for strikeouts in a game with 14 and strikeouts for the tournament with 38.

At the plate the Minutewomen rank 18th in the nation at .313 and fourth in ERA at 0.80. They are one of only five teams to be ranked in both categories.

Leading the way has been senior first baseman Kim Gutridge, batting .416. Junior second baseman Mandy Galas holds is at .381, while Osier is close behind at .376. Gutridge and Osier were named to the A-10 All-Conference Team, as well as junior leftfielder Becky George.

Senior Kelly Buckley has been hot at the plate for the Minutewomen as of late. Since returning from a thumb injury on April 11, she has hit .467, including 15 RBI in 18 games. She has also posted a .633 slugging percentage and a .554 on-base-percentage.

Virgina Tech meanwhile, will be entering the A-10 tournament for the first time in school history. Although the Hokies are a strong hitting team, batting .301, they have also opponents have hit .302 against them.

Freshman right fielder Ali Verbage, the A-10 Rookie of the Year, has developed into one of the conference's top players, holding a batting average of .374. She has eight homeruns this season, and has garnered 46 RBI.

Senior Michelle Johnson is the top pitcher for the Hokies. She holds an ERA of 2.13 and a record of 19-15.

UM set to hit road and face SBU

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

After wrapping up their fifth consecutive Atlantic-10 division-al crown last weekend in taking two of three from Rhode Island, the Massachusetts baseball team will now look to solidify the No. 1 seed in the upcoming A-10 tourney when they travel to Olean, NY, this weekend for a three-game set with St. Bonaventure.

"Winning it five years in a row is a very hard thing to do," Massachusetts baseball coach Mike Stone said. "[There was a time when] we knew that this is where we wanted to be, and now we're kind of use to it [winning titles]. But I think that it's important to never forget where we started from."

Standing in the way of that top spot in the tourney will be the Bonnies, who bring a 20-19 mark into the game. St. Bonaventure carries a 7-8 conference mark into the weekend as well, and needs a sweep of the Minutemen in order to have a shot at making the A-10 tourney.

"It will be tough this weekend because they'll be playing for something," Stone said. "I'm excited to play there. It's kind of the only game in town there, and it can be a difficult place to play because their students are very vocal and get behind their team."

UMass (25-10, 13-2 in A-10) is coming off a 15-11 win over Vermont on Tuesday, while the Bonnies are fresh off a sweep over Niagara on Wednesday.

Leading the way for the Bonnies this weekend will be junior outfielder Tom Thiebaud. The DuBoid, Penn. native brings a .328 average into the game, and is coming off a 3- for-4 performance in game two of the doubleheader with Niagara. Senior first baseman Greg Mamula is hitting at a .320 clip and leads the team with 10 doubles.

Other offensive threats for St. Bonaventure include senior shortstop Robb Vogtli, freshman outfielder Jim Wolf and junior catcher Eric Hemphill, all of whom are hitting over .300.

However, the Bonnies lack team power. Hemphill leads the team in homers with three, while Thiebaud leads in RBI with 26.

The pitching staff is anchored by senior right-hander Ryan Rademacker, who is 5-4 with a 6.17 earned run average in nine starts. Fellow classmate Ryan LaMattina is next in line with a 3-4 mark and a 2.25 ERA to go along with four complete games. Others who could see time on the hill include Wolf, who is 2-0 with a 2.31 ERA and three saves, Vogtli (2-1 record in 15 appearances), Aaron Bouie III, Vince Cozier, Mike Manning and Mike Gray.

On the UMass side of things, senior second baseman Muchie Dagliere continues to lead the team with a .449 average. Pete Gatreau has also been hot of late, and leads the team in homers and RBI, to go along with an average around .370.

The remainder of the Minutemen lineup is just as potent, proving that UMass may have one of the best one through nine lineups in the nation. Doug Clark, Shaun Skeffington, Seth Kaplan and Aaron Braunstein are all over the .300 mark, while Matt Wolcott, Brian Samela and Bryan Mazzaferro are also making solid offensive contributions.

On the mound for UMass this weekend will be Bill Cooke (7-1, 2.43 ERA), Scott Barnsby (2-2, 4.91 ERA) and Ryan Cameron (5-3, 3.88 ERA), all of whom will see action as starters.

"We need to focus on our next goal, which is the No. 1 seed. We need the best overall winning percentage in the league to do that," Stone said. "In order to get that we need to play well this weekend and try to gain some momentum heading into the A-10s."

An entire season of close-to perfection results has come down to the Atlantic 10 tournament at Blacksburg, Va., this weekend for the Massachusetts women's and men's track teams.

The men carry an unblemished 7-0 record this spring, with a crushing defeat over Boston College 116.5-44.5, and placing first in mixed meets as well. UMass has never won an A-10 title, as they finished second to Virginia Tech last year, losing narrowly by 176-161.

UMass baseball has a rock in Samela

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

All it takes is a quick look at Massachusetts catcher Brian Samela to figure out what kind of a baseball player he is.

On this particular afternoon, Samela emerges from the locker room and makes his way to Lorden Field. The Cheshire, Conn. native sports a goatee and dirt-stained pants, and is ready for another practice with the Atlantic 10 Eastern Division Champs.

Yes, Samela is an imposing presence, the kind of kid that you wouldn't want to meet in a dark alley on a quiet night. He plays the game of baseball with reckless abandon and is more than willing to dive into a fence or dugout in pursuit of a ball.

After all, Brian Samela is a throwback.

"I go all out in everything I do. I give 100 percent, like it's all or nothing," Samela said. "That's the way I approach life, and especially the game of baseball. That's the old time way to do it: for the love of the game."

"He's hard-nosed in every facet, and every team needs to have a guy like that," Massachusetts baseball coach Mike Stone said. "With that goatee he looks tough, and he acts tough out there on the field. He's a scrapper in every sense of the word."

The UMass catcher has been a mainstay behind the plate, starting every game this season while carrying a .296 average with 20 RBI. Catchers are notorious for taking a day or so off every once in a while, primarily due to the extreme physical activity that is required at that position. However, when the Minutemen encountered a handful of non-conference games over the past few weeks, Samela was still out there on the field, playing his no-holds barred brand of baseball.

"I don't want a day off. I just want to play every day," Samela said. "Sitting the bench sucks."

Nevertheless, this Minuteman still refuses to take a breather or tone down his intensity a notch on the diamond, even if there is no designated backup. Seth Kaplan would probably be first in line should Samela need a rest or suffer an injury, as the current starting shortstop for UMass caught a few innings in an early season contest.

"I don't think about getting hurt, even when I'm diving into a dugout in Rhode Island. The last thing on my mind was getting hurt. I was just thinking about catching the ball," Samela said.

Samela came to UMass after a year of prep school at Trinity-Pawling, which was preceded by a stellar

Last Khmer Rouge bases destroyed

SIEM REAP, Cambodia (AP) — As refugees fled across the border, Cambodia declared Saturday that it had all but destroyed one of the world's most brutal revolutionary movements by rooting out the Khmer Rouge's last bases on the Thai frontier.

"Everything was over yesterday," Premier Hun Sen said, claiming his forces had seized the remaining Khmer Rouge territory along the northern border. He said government troops were consolidating their positions.

But fighting continued, and Thai military officers said a total extinction of the jungle-savvy guerrillas would be difficult. The Khmer Rouge hold other enclaves across the country.

The English-language Bangkok Post reported yesterday that about 30 refugees were killed and 20 others wounded when an artillery shell thought to have been fired by Cambodian government forces landed in their midst Friday. "I have brought my wife and children here, and then I'm going back to the battlefield," said one Khmer Rouge fighter who crossed the border along with more than 20,000 refugees fleeing the government offensive.

Protestors in 5 states ask for gun safeties

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. (AP) — Protesters marched outside America's largest handgun maker Saturday to demand safeguards they say will cut down on the thousands of gun deaths that happen each year. "We are holding the gun industry responsible because they have refused to design, advertise and market their products to save the lives of children," said Arlene Locicero, 58, of Hawthorne, N.J. Locicero, whose daughter was one of six people killed in a 1993 shooting aboard a Long Island commuter train, was among 150 people protesting outside Smith & Wesson.

The protest was one of several scheduled to be held Saturday outside the country's largest gun makers in Connecticut, Georgia, Maryland, Massachusetts and Virginia.

Protesters laid out 5,285 pairs of shoes to represent the number of young people age 19 and under who died from gunshots either by homicide, suicide or accident in 1995, the latest year for which statistics were available.

The Silent March protesters as they called themselves want weapons manufacturers to make guns child-proof, drop laser sights and hollow-point bullets, display prominent warning labels on guns, reduce production and raise prices.

Southport, Conn., to protest at Sturm, Ruger & Co. Another hundred protested in Baltimore, Maryland is home to the gunmaker Beretta.

Police keep sharp watch on Hobart Lane activity

Officer Mike Johnson patrols Hobart Lane Saturday afternoon.

By Paul Hayes
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — As they ate pizza and drank soda, the large contingent of police officers was the only group having a party as they kept watch over what was, at 2 p.m. on Saturday, a subdued Hobart Lane.

Nearly 40 Amherst police officers, were stationed all around Hobart Lane to prevent the occurance of another "Hobart Hoe-Down." The number of officers nearly equalled that of the students, most of whom sat on the doorsteps of the Gilreath Manor apartments.

Police were provided with a complete list of all Hobart Lane student leasees, as well as a guest list of the leasees. The police used the lists to ensure that all incoming motorists and pedestrians were either Hobart residents or expected visitors. Anyone who was not on the list was turned away.

Franklin Baxley, of 1039 North Pleasant St., said he felt there were constitutional problems in regards to the strong police presence.

"They asked me to show my I.D. before I could get in my own house," Baxley said. "I understand they don't want [the Hoe-Down] to happen again, but I feel like I'm in jail; it's a very confining situation." Baxley said.

According to Captain Charles Sherpa, the police were instructed to keep the peace, and to be sensitive to Hobart residents. But in the event that any infractions occurred, no warnings would be given and imme-

Shamapande and Court elected to president, trustee

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

Salwa Shamapande was elected University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) president and Eleanor Court was elected student trustee after the votes were tallied early Friday morning from the near perfect election.

"I feel really good about winning the elections. The elections commission did a great job and procedurally it was run fairly," Court said.

Both candidates won by large majorities.

"The margin of victory here is huge, Elly won by 414 votes and Salwa won by 374 votes," said Chancellor of Elections Seth Presser.

"Salwa Shamapande won with a little over 59 percent of the vote and Elly Court won with a little under 59 percent."

Presser said Shamapande would take office Wednesday and Court will take office in July.

"The president will be sworn in Wednesday at the senate meeting because the president's term actually started April 1. So as soon as the senate ratifies the elections, Salwa can be sworn in," Presser said.

"The trustee's term doesn't start until July 1," Presser said.

The elections ran according to the letter of the constitution in contrast to the last SGA elections which were nullified by unconstitutional elections procedures.

"This really was a near perfect election," Presser said. "I'm very proud of these elections."

There was an increase in student voter turn out from the original elections.

"Voter turnout is a little bit higher, like 500 votes" Presser said.

Following the constitution, provisional absentee ballots would have caused the increase.

"There were 288 absentee ballots and absentee ballots weren't used in the last elections so that could account for the 300," Presser said.

Students also had their voice heard on three referendum questions.

Presser said students "overwhelmingly" voted that the 24-hour card access security did not increase security and that it should be abolished.

Students also voted for a mix of general and reserved seating in the Mullins Center.

Despite some senators possible disapproval of the election's results, Presser feels the elections will be ratified.

"People will be very much against this because some people feel the presidency was stolen from Amy Pellegrino. I think in the end though they will be ratified," Presser said.

BCP recognizes seniors at 24th annual banquet

By Julie Fialkow
Collegian Staff

Eighty-two University of Massachusetts seniors were honored Friday night, at the 24th Anniversary Graduation and Awards Banquet for the Bilingual Collegiate Program (BCP).

The BCP offers academic support and assists Latino and other minority students with tutoring, career and financial aid counselling. Approximately 450 students are currently enrolled in the program.

Senior Peggy Nieves, a senior philosophy major and UMass water polo player, reflected on her experiences with the BCP.

"For the two years I've been here, [BCP has] taken care of me. They've given me tutors and a job as an office assistant," Nieves said.

Fellow senior and operations management major Anny Sanchez, also feels that the BCP has been an integral part of her success here at the University.

"They've offered me tutors and helped me reach my goals. They're like a home away from home. I've made a lot of friends in the program," Sanchez said.

Keynote speaker of the evening's program was Dr. Arthur Eve, director of the Donahue Institute for Governmental Services, the organization which was instrumental in the birth of the Bilingual Collegiate program.

"In 1973 people asked,'Why BCP? Why share your money with them? Why align with an institution that is controversial?' You see there was definitely a power struggle going on at this school, at that time. My answer to those people was, 'It seems like the right thing to do,'" Eve said.

He also talked about four principles that he encouraged the students to think about.

"Give back to your community. Use your influence and principles towards what you believe in. Help people shape their futures, that can't shape their own. Help, simply because it is the right thing to do," he said.

Senior student speaker Malwin Davila, a sociology major, also shared his beliefs on strengthening community with the audience in the Commonwealth Room.

"We must fight for more, or we'll loie everything we already have. Don't complain if you don't like the way things are, let people know or get involved. Give a damn. Care about your community," Davila said.

Other speakers at the event were BCP Director Benjamen Rodriguez, and special aid to the mayor of Springfield, Carlos Gonzalez. The evening was hosted by BCP seniors Ainex Baez and Edwin Mijia, both of whom were given special honors at the banquet for achieving a GPA higher than 3.2.

According to freshman BCP spokesperson Juan Suarez, he and others worked for about a month and a half to organize the banquet. BCP staff member Jose Bou, helped the team of 28 students coordinate the ceremony.

Cayena, a dance troop from the registered student organization Casa Dominicana, also entertained the audience with two flamenco-inspired choreographed dances. Music during dinner was provided by guitar player and BCP graduate, Francisco Hernandez, and afterwards, by DJ Kassanova from Springfield, and the Home Boys from New York.

Irish citizens optimistic about peace accord

By Paul Hayes
Collegian Staff

After years of fighting, there may be peace at last in Ireland, following the creation of a peace agreement on April 11 in Belfast, Northern Ireland.

The agreement arose from multi-party talks between Prime Ministers Tony Blair of Britain and Bertie Ahern of the Irish Republic, David Trimble of Northern Ireland's Ulster Unionists, Gerry Adams of the Republic's Sinn Fein, and a number of other participants.

The agreement proved to be a landmark because of the involvement of paramilitary groups such as the Protestant Ulster Unionists and the Catholic Sinn Fein. Up until the discussions preceding this agreement, these paramilitary groups have refused to negotiate with one another. The acrimony between these groups dates back hundreds of years.

It partly originates from Catholic Ireland's bloody war for independence from Protestant Britain in the early part of this century. The conflicts between both militant Catholics and Protestants have centered on Northern Ireland. Many Catholics believe the North rightfully belongs to the Irish Republic, despite the prevalent feeling among Northern Ireland's Protestant majority that the North should remain a part of England.

If the agreement passes separate referendum votes, in the Irish Republic and Northern Ireland, it will provide the North with the means to shape its own destiny. As a result, Northern Ireland could choose to remain part of England, or to rejoin with the Republic of Ireland.

Citizens of Northern Ireland will be given the opportunity to decide if they want to be part of the Irish republic, but it is likely that the North will remain part of England.

It is a widely held opinion that the North's Protestant, pro- British majority will choose to remain aligned with Britain well into the next century, rather than reunite with the mostly Catholic republic.

The agreement requires the Republic of Ireland to eliminate Article Three from its constitution, which claims Northern Ireland as a part of the Republic — a situation which makes even less pressing any attempts to create a united Ireland.

The agreement would establish a number of new governmental bodies. These include an independent Northern Ireland Assembly, a North-South cross border council linking Belfast and Dublin, and an East-West council which would connect the Parliaments of Ireland and Britain, and the Northern Ireland Assembly.

Northern Ireland's Catholic minority would be given more power in the new Northern Ireland assembly, and the Republic of Ireland would have

MSU leads in alcohol arrests

EAST LANSING, Mich. — Police fired tear gas into a crowd of 3,000 Michigan State University students early Saturday who lit a fire in the city's downtown to protest a ban on drinking at a favorite party spot.

The confrontation came a few hours before the release of a national study that said the school leads the nation's universities in alcohol-related arrests.

Meanwhile, police in New Hampshire were pelted with bottles, beer cans and rocks when they tried to disperse more than 500 partying

Plymouth State College students and visitors early Saturday.

Both altercations come the week that students were finishing up their final exams.

In Michigan, demonstrators were angry that the university decided to put a stop to drinking at Munn Field, a campus spot where fans hold parties before and after Spartan football games. Students tore through a fence surrounding the field before heading to the campus home of Michigan State President M. Peter McPherson. He was not at home.

The crowd, estimated at 3,000 people, moved into downtown East Lansing, chanting obscenities at police. Just after midnight the protesters lit a fire in one of downtown's busiest intersections. Police fired tear gas into the crowd so firefighters could put out the blaze, police said. Another bonfire was lit near the edge of campus, and police fired tear gas again to clear a path for firefighters.

Students were accused of throwing bottles and rocks at police. Seventeen people were arrested, mostly for disorderly conduct. At least five people were treated for minor injuries.

Also Saturday, it took about 80 officers from throughout New Hampshire to bring under control a crowd of hundreds of students at an annual off-campus fraternity party at Plymouth State.

more power and influence over Northern Ireland's affairs.

The referendum votes will be held on May 22 in both Ireland and Northern Ireland. A vote against it on either side would kill the agreement.

Irish students on exchange at the university and local Irish scholars are cautiously optimistic that the peace will be lasting, and said the hardest work is still ahead.

"[Irish] adults, those around 35 years old, have known nothing but violence all their lives, it will take a long time for their pain and divisions to heal," said Peter Curran, an exchange student originally from Cork City, County Cork.

History of Conflict

The violence in Northern Ireland results from hostilities between Ireland and England that have existed as far back as 1170 A.D., when England first occupied Ireland. The current conflict over ownership of Northern Ireland can be traced back to 1918, when Irish delegates to the English House of Commons declared Ireland a Republic.

Following a guerilla war with England, Ireland gained its independence in 1922, but England still controlled Northern Ireland. The majority of Northern Ireland's population are Protestant, most of whom still want to be aligned with England.

Yet Article Three of the Republic of Ireland's constitution states Northern Ireland as a part of the Republic. The Irish Republican Army (IRA), claim that their violent campaigns against Protestants and English Sympathizers have been conducted to carry out the charge of Article Three.

As a result, Catholic paramilitaries who want a united Ireland have been fighting against Protestant paramilitaries who want to remain part of England.

The violence between Catholic and Protestant paramilitaries, as well as British police and military forces escalated in the 1960s, and since 1969 nearly 3,200 people have been killed in sectarian warfare. One other attempt for peace, talks which involved Ireland and England in the 1970s, fell apart because they did not involve or receive support from the paramilitary groups.

Catherine Shannon, a Westfield State College history professor and adjunct University of Massachusetts history professor, said the passage of the referendum will be dicier in the North than in the Republic, because of the involvement the Republic and Catholics are given in Northern Ireland's affairs.

She also said it will be hard to sell this peace agreement to older, or more militant, citizens of Ireland because of the provision which makes Ireland give up claims to Northern Ireland.

"Some older republicans will see its passage [and the revocation of Article Three] as a betrayal of [the revolution of] 1918," Shannon said.

For many Irish people, it is not a question of what it will take to establish peace, just as long as it is established.

"I'd love to see a united Ireland, but if staying with Britain stopped the violence, I'd settle for it," said Donagh McMaugh of Omagh in County Tyrone, Northern Ireland.

Not a Warzone

Contrary to the impression the news may give, Northern Ireland is not a warzone, McMaugh said.

"We come [to America], and people think Northern Ireland's all fighting, they think you're ducking bullets," McMaugh said. "But it doesn't stop life, it's a small minority [involved in the fighting]."

As is the case in most areas, you have safe areas and you have rough areas, McMaugh said. But this is not to say that she is completely immune from being scared by the terrorism employed by Catholic and Protestant paramilitaries.

McMaugh said she wasn't afraid until an incident occurred near Christmas of last year. At that time, Protestants killed a number of former IRA members who worked at a restaurant just down the road from the restaurant she worked at.

Shannon, who travels to Ireland multiple times each year, said there have been times when the violence and tension intensified causing her to be scared, and said a bomb once went off near where she was staying.

"I did get blown out of bed by a nearby bomb, but I managed to get back to my bed and returned to sleep," Shannon said.

According to Shannon, the Irish develop a sense of humor about it as a defense mechanism.

"When you got a parking ticket, you would ask 'why don't they get the terrorists?'" Shannon said.

The violence persists due to the hard–line stance taken by some of the more militant leaders and their political parties, including Ian Paisley and the Ulster Unionists.

"Paisley is unwilling to compromise, and people like that could be dangerous," Curran said. "The hard–liners would prefer to go on fighting."

Yet people like Paisley are fast being replaced, and their attitudes are being disregarded by many of their former supporters, the foremost of whom is Ulster Unionist David Trimble.

The Ulster Unionist representative during the peace talks, Trimble risked his political life by willing to compromise goals and values that his party had held fast to for decades — including being involved in talks that also involved their archnemesis the IRA.

"Paisley gives Unionists a bad name, but I have great respect for Trimble," Curran said. "Trimble was willing to give concessions; he's willing to infuriate some of the members of his own party for peace. [Trimble] restores my faith in Unionists."

According to Shannon, Paisley is not getting the backing he did 20 years ago from the Ulster Loyalists. When he tried to rile up feelings, the paramilitaries interrupted him, she said.

Trimble had previously been a close ally of Paisleys, and in 1995, he had led a parade past a police blockade and through a Catholic district, after which he celebrated this conquest with Paisley.

It may reflect a general move in the thinking of the Irish, including Curran, that while fighting may have been necessary when Ireland fought for independence from England 75 years ago, it is not necessary now.

"We have one of the best economies in Europe, in the world," Curran said. "War scares away tourists and business, we're only hurting ourselves."

Derry or Londonderry?

The Northern Ireland province of Londonderry is also called Derry. This discrepancy is a product of the tensions between Protestant loyalists (who call it Derry) and Catholic unionists (who call it Londonderry).

Even if the peace accord is approved by both Northern Ireland and the Republic, the tensions between those who choose the name Derry and those who choose Londonderry will remain.

The dispute between Catholics and Protestants is most clearly seen during the marching season in Northern Ireland. During the Marching Season, Orangemen (groups of Protestants) conduct 2,500 parades along established parade routes to celebrate important moments in Protestant history, such as the Battle of the Boyne in 1690. The Orangemen are named for English King William of Orange, a Protestant, who defeated his Catholic rival James III.

The Orangemen parade routes often pass through Catholic neighborhoods, and Catholics often view these parades as bragging ceremonies. They say the parades are displays of bigotry, and unwelcome reminders of past Protestant oppression.

Protestants, however, said the parades are central to their identities.

Often, Catholic protestors and police forces will block off the parades in order to force them to reroute around Catholic areas, and bloody, violent conflicts often erupt as a result.

Yet in the wake of the peace accord, this violence has been avoided once last week, which could serve as an indication of increased efforts to avoid violence by all sides. Yet the peace in some parts of Northern Ireland is still primarily enured by the separation of conflicting sides.

Peace by separation is evident in the discos of Ireland, said Mairead Bradley of Letterkenny in County Donegal, Republic of Ireland.

"[In Irish Republic discos] at the end of the night, the national anthem is played," Bradley said. "But not in Northern Ireland, because they have two anthems — which one do you play?"

McMaugh said it is very rare to find a mixed Protestant/Catholic nightclub in North Ireland.

Both McMaugh and Bradley are on exchange from the University of Ulster–MaGee, which is in Derry/Londonderry. Despite being from opposite sides of the border, their friendship is indicative of the general feeling amongst most Irish citizens and sympathizers: they want peace.

diate action would be taken.

"I feel like I'm in the dorms, the way we have to sign a friend in," Jonathan P. Katz of 40 Hobart Lane, said. "There must be something constitutionally wrong with this."

The strong police presence comes in reaction to last year's Hoe–Down, in which numerous people were taken to hospitals and 58 people were arrested. Many town government bodies and University of Massachusetts representatives had spoken strongly, saying they wished to prevent a similar event from taking place this year.

Yet some students say that no Hoe–Down was planned for this year, and blame the town and local media for spreading word of it, and for stirring up sentiment against Hobart.

"They think that if no one shows up, they won," UMass student Shellie Lenczner said. "But no one was going to show up anyway."

Gilreath resident Kevin Rua said the first time he heard about the Hoe–Down was from a local news broadcast.

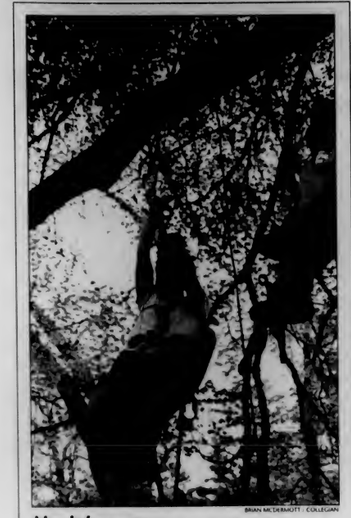
"We heard about the Hoe–Down from 22 News, we weren't planning on having one," Rua said.

A few students shouted for the cops to go home, but for the most part a resigned peace was maintained, and some residents even went so far as to go out and get some officers coffee and donuts.

The police had decided to keep a full shift of 15 officers on duty throughout the rest of town, so the officers present at Hobart were the remainder of those on the police force.

"Everyone normally off–duty is on duty," Sherpa said. Sherpa was the on–site head of the policing on Hobart Lane.

Most of the on–duty officers for the Hoe–Down were paid overtime for their services. No accurate figure could be obtained as to the exact amount that the Hobart operation would cost the police department at the time the paper went to press.



"It's good our tax money is going to this event," said Mario Gomes of 39 Hobart Lane.

Greg Ginand of 41 Hobart Lane, attended last year's Hoe– Down, and said the Hoe–Down itself was not the problem, but that the rain, which softened up the ground, was what led to increased property damage and injuries.

Kim Hak Youn of 50 Hobart Lane, was not here for last year's Hoe–Down, but said he has no problem with student parties as long as the music is not too loud.

"The problem is the kind of music they play," Youn said. "If they turned it down, it wouldn't bother me anymore."

Youn, a non–student, lives in one of only two houses on Hobart Lane not occupied by students. He has only lived on Hobart Lane for two months, and said he was concerned about what would occur at Hobart over the next few weeks, and hopes nothing will get out of hand.

Top students go to UM

BOSTON (AP) — The number of top-ranked Massachusetts high school seniors who have accepted scholarships to the University of Massachusetts for this fall has nearly doubled, according to school officials.

UMass President William Bulger said 130 first- and second-ranked seniors from the state's 400 public and private high schools have indicated that they plan to enroll next year — ranking a 50 percent increase from this academic year.

This year 87 freshmen are enrolled in the University Scholars program, which guarantees admission to valedictorians and salutatorians from Massachusetts high schools and offers scholarships of as much as $8,000 a year.

The scholarships, awarded regardless of need, are renewed annually if the student maintains a minimum grade point average. Bulger told The Boston Globe that the enrollment increases show the state's public university is providing top students with an alternative to high-cost private colleges.

"The university is now the first choice for many of the best students, which means the public and private investments being made, are paying dividends," Bulger said.

Remembering May Day

Last Friday was May Day, which is celebrated around the world as the international workers' holiday. However, even though it began in the United States, this is the only industrial nation which does not recognize the holiday. The vast majority of Americans know nothing about it, or labor history in general, or even the contemporary role of the labor movement in our society.

"Without a strong and revitalized labor movement here and abroad, it is very unlikely that our serious social and economic problems can be solved, and the quality of life for most people will continue to erode."

Tom Coish

The year 1886 was a momentous one in American labor history. This was the era of the "robber barons" — the tremendous growth in the size, wealth and power of industrialists and corporations in the United States. Unions had no legal rights to bargain collectively with their employers; the law and the courts were generally used against workers and their unions by corporations and their allies in government. Unions had few options other than strikes, often long and bitter, to pressure employers to negotiate fair labor agreements.

On May 4, 1886, union leaders in Chicago held a mass rally in Haymarket Square to advocate for the eight-hour day (something most American workers now take for granted, but was in fact achieved only after decades of struggle). During the rally, someone (to this day no one really knows who) set off a bomb in the crowd which killed eight policemen and wounded over 70 other people. Police then fired on the crowd, killing and wounding even more.

Almost immediately, authorities and the sensationalistic press of the time blamed several labor activists who organized or addressed the rally, and a severe anti-labor sentiment was whipped up throughout the country. Despite the lack of evidence which linked them to the bombing, eight activists were convicted of the bombing, on the theory that their political expression of "radical" ideas such as the eight-hour day directly caused the deaths and injuries at the rally. Despite an international outcry of protest, the eight were executed by hanging.

In honor of the Haymarket martyrs, May 1 — May Day — became the international workers' holiday everywhere except the United States, where it all began.

Besides the eight-hour day, the labor movement went on to win many other victories for working people, such as laws prohibiting child labor, and establishing minimum wages, occupational safety and health rules, social security, and unemployment insurance. Its support was crucial in obtaining passage of much other progressive legislation such as civil rights and anti-discrimination laws, and will be crucial in the future if we are ever able to have meaningful national health care reform, or laws to protect workers and their communities when corporations desert them for low-wage locations around the world.

However, unions have been in decline since their peak membership and influence in the 1940s, to the point where they only represent about 10 percent of the private sector work force. There are many reasons for this decline, including biased coverage of labor issues in the corporate-owned mainstream media and ineffective enforcement of laws which supposedly protect the right to organize and bargain collectively.

It is no coincidence that the decline in the labor movement has paralleled the decline in income, public services and other aspects of our standard of living, while the rich elite in our country have seen their incomes and control over the nation's wealth skyrocket in the past few decades. Just like in the 1880s, our society is experiencing tremendous growth in the size and dominance of corporate interests, and in economic and political inequality, as well as more sensationalistic and anti-labor media coverage.

Many unions are struggling to reverse these trends through new innovative organizing strategies and political activity, earning the wrath of anti-labor politicians and corporate leaders. Union activists and also forming alliances with other grass-roots community organizations with common progressive agendas as well as labor unions and activists around the world.

The labor movement remains one of the largest and most progressive forces for economic and social justice, here and around the world. Without a strong and revitalized labor movement here and abroad, it is very unlikely that our serious social and economic problems can be solved, and the quality of life for most people will continue to erode. Learning about and remembering May Day and labor history could be an important part of such a revitalization.

Tom Coish is an attorney at the Student Legal Services Office, and president of the UMass Amherst Chapter of Local 509, Service Employees' International Union, the professional staff union on campus.

An end to the Troubles

Ireland is an unusual country. It features some of the world's most ruggedly beautiful landscapes, lush and green. The people are unfailingly polite and kind, but tension lurks below the surface. For centuries, deep-rooted hatred and violence have undermined the tranquility of this island nation, inflicting unending death and suffering that has, over the years, come to be seen as the price for living in such a lovely place.

Marty Keane

However, thanks to a laborious 22 months of negotiations and bargaining, the Troubles — as they've become known as — may be over.

On Good Friday, in what can be considered one of the great miracles of the late 20th century — like the end of the Cold War and apartheid in South Africa — the governments of Britain and Ireland, along with the key political leaders of warring factions in Northern Ireland (with major assistance from Bill Clinton and former Senator George Mitchell) agreed to replace terrorism with democracy and let the people of the North decide their own fate.

The agreement provides for a Northern Ireland Assembly, made up of 108 members elected by the people of Ulster to administer their own land, meaning Protestants and Catholics will be sharing power — a major step forward. In addition, the people of Ulster and the Republic will be empowered with the choice of whether to unite as one Ireland in the future.

As an Irish-American whose great-grandfather was a member of the Irish Republican Army (I.R.A.), I thought I had a sense of what life was like in Ulster and what it meant to be the victim of political oppression. While I'm not a proponent of violence, I can say that I understand my grandfather's feelings and his reasons for doing what he did.

Upon visiting Belfast in the fall of 1996, I quickly realized that life in the North was not what I had pictured. Gazing out of the train terminal, I immediately saw a look in people's eyes that was painfully familiar. Here was a people wrought with resignation and world-weariness. Clearly, these people were ready to move on, I thought. As I walked down a main street, graffiti-littered walls were everywhere, but not the kind I was used to seeing in urban America. This was something altogether different.

"Brits Out Now!" screamed the side of an abandoned warehouse. The face of Gerry Adams, Sinn Fein president, was omnipresent, juxtaposed against murals touting anti-Catholic messages proclaiming Protestant Unionist sentiments.

It was a surreal experience, to say the least, seeing flatbed trucks filled with armed gunmen patrolling the streets. Even by spending just one day in Belfast, I realized that the Troubles were about much more than just bombings and threats. The Troubles were about life itself. Everyone's life has been affected in some way or another by this unrest, be it directly or indirectly. Simply by living in Ireland, one must have an opinion on the matter. Middle ground didn't exist, or so I thought before last month's peace accord.

The courage shown by everyone involved in the peace negotiations, from British Prime Minister Tony Blair to unionist leader David Trimble to Adams, should be applauded. The fact that an agreement was reached through compromise and, more importantly, trust, must be taken as an unmistakable sign that all involved are sick of their history and want to move on.

Why couldn't this have been accomplished years ago? The political climate wasn't the same as today. Times change, people change. Hopefully, with this agreement, Ireland will change as well.

On May 22, voters in the North and the Irish Republic will go to the polls to accept or reject the agreement. Let's hope that peace is given a chance.

NCAA loophole spells abuse

The National College Athletic Association (NCAA) has taken something bad and made it even worse.

In effort to regulate the cash cow that has become college athletics, the NCAA passed Proposition 62 last month which allows college athletes to earn up to $2,000 during the academic year by working on- or off-campus jobs. Originally intended to come into play last August, Prop. 62 is now on the books and effective as of Aug. 1.

Chris Stamm

On the surface this seems fair enough, but upon closer look, the good people from the NCAA are setting themselves up for a fall.

Like any other student, student-athletes deserve the right to hold part-time or work-study jobs, especially those in big-time Division I basketball and football programs out making millions for their schools. However, Prop. 62 allows a dangerous caveat which panders to athletic fund boosters nation-wide.

According to the legislation, Prop. 62 "permits athletic departments or athletic interests to Intercede on behalf of a student athlete to secure such employment."

Overland Park, we have a problem — athletic interest? What is an athletic interest, you ask? An athletic interest is any University alum who, back in the day was either cut from the team or enamored with the lifestyle of potential big-leaguers. He is now financially successful, morally oblivious and sees his deep pockets as a necessity to win the big game.

Can you imagine if a certain Hartford lawyer was considered an athletic interest?

"Hi, Marcus. Listen, I've got a job for you, yeah, it's a position in grocery distribution and jewelry consulting. Meet me down as the McDonald's on Route 9, I've got some groceries for you to hang on to for a few days at your place. Oh, yeah, I almost forgot. I bought this nifty little necklace, but I don't know if I really like it. You think you could try it out for a few days and tell me what you think?"

Though any agent peddling his services to a student-athlete must register with the school's athletic department, the NCAA gives schools loose guidelines, and ultimately forces each school to hammer out its own process.

Prop. 62 has the potential to make this much, much worse.

"We are delighted to give student-athletes the opportunity to work in this way," Kenneth Shaw, chair of the Division I Board of Directors and Chancellor of Syracuse University, said in an NCAA press statement last month. "We said we were going to do this, and we're doing it. It's a good first step, and we recognize that there likely will be changes as we put the legislation into action... We should consider this a work in progress."

For starters, why doesn't Prop. 62 give a definition of athletic interest?

Despite the fact that $2,000 is chump change relative to how much schools earn from television and licensing rights, it is an acceptable amount. In revising Prop. 62, the NCAA separated the $2,000 sum from being included in any scholarship money awarded to the student — fair enough. However, in the document's rationale section the NCAA claims the provision, "will ensure equal employment opportunities for both full athletic and partial athletic grant recipients and will discourage athletic departments from creating numerous questionable employment arrangements for student-athletes within the athletic department."

Great, so athletic directors nation-wide won't have their star athletes passing out towels in locker rooms for $2,000 a year.

Why would they want a lousy job like that when an "athletic interest" can legally give them that NCAA-sanctioned sum working as a "paper clip organization specialist" for some alum's local law firm.

Just think of the implications this will have on signing new recruits.

"Sure coach, I'll sign with your team. In addition to my full scholarship I would like a guaranteed job which pays $2,000 over the course of the year doing absolutely nothing."

That is not to say each school will abuse Prop. 62, but the NCAA should know that where legal grey spots arise, scandal will follow. Are they really watching out for student interests or providing careless loopholes to bring in outside money?

Letters to the Editor

The role of Saddam Hussein

To the editor:

Regarding "Crises in Iraq,"(Collegian, April 27, April 28) I must take notice of the conspicuous absence within the editorial of Saddam Hussein's role in mass starvation, deprivation of medical needs and general calamity in Iraq.

Are the sanctions excessive? Probably. Have they been applied to the right people? Definitely not. But what choices did Hussein present to the Allied Coalition? Hussein feared for his position as dictator because Iraq's economy was shattered after the Iran-Iraq war and there was nothing to show for it. So, Hussein plugged Kuwait for hard cash.

To allow his regime to profit, in any way, condones such naked aggression. If sanctions come down, it looks like a capitulation, and Hussein will make the most political mileage he can from it, tightening his hold on the country and regaining face among the Arab leadership (most of whom still loathe him).

The stated reason sanctions remain in place is to provide nuclear weapons inspectors with leverage. The unstated (or understated) reason is to push this man out of power, by making Iraqis miserable enough to take him out. America would do it, but the rest of the Arab world would publicly accuse the United States of imperialism, Zionism, racism... take your pick. I'll bet a few would offer private thanks, however. Kuwait, Syria, Saudi Arabia and Iran come immediately to mind.

The problem, simply, is that we are unwilling to state the removal of Hussein as an open objective. With that done, sanctions of an entirely different — and more personal — nature could replace those which now burden this nation victimized by monstrous leadership. I only wish the rest of the Arab Nation would step up to the plate and take care of him on their own. It can be done. Their inaction is as much to blame for starving children as the action of the U.N. I respect the opinion of Hussein Ibish, and I think he has the fruit of the problem in his hand. I hope he peels it to its core in further commentary.

Truly keeping an open mind?

To the editor:

I think Seth Koenig is a chicken. It's easy to fire rhetorical bullets from the safety of the Collegian office, and then run and hide when anyone tries to challenge your fuzzy, uninformed opinions on religion in a real life conversation. Koenig's opinions concerning the "historical" person of Jesus Christ seem especially ignorant. Because Jesus is a historical figure, we can know quite a bit about what he did and might have been concerned about. To have an "opinion" that his man objective was to teach people about "the lost art of kindness," is roughly the same as saying Napoleon's main concern was to wear funny hats and ride horses.

It seems that many on this campus claim to be beacons of open-mindedness and enlightenment. However, most of what I witnessed last week in regards to UMass' response to the Friends of Jesus was just the opposite. Most of what I witnessed was closed-mindedness and ignorance.

Having an open mind is being willing to hear both sides of an argument, and being willing to have your own views and perspectives challenged.

In an article last Friday (Collegian, April 24), Bridget Dolezsar grossly misrepresented the views of the Friends of Jesus (as have many others). The Friends of Jesus obviously believe that both "homosexuality and premarital sex are wrong." However, that is very different than saying just because "someone is homosexual or has premarital sex they will go to hell" (you will not find this statement anywhere in their literature or speech). By condemning them without fully understanding what they were saying and by failing to make a distinction between the previous two statements, Dolezsar gave us a good example of what it means to be close minded and ignorant.

Here's another example: "I don't think Jesus worried terribly about who was sleeping with who" or "in my eyes, if there is a God, he certainly wouldn't be punishing anyone." These are two opinions that I have read in the past week. Everyone has a right to their own opinion. But not all opinions are right, and in fact, some are very ignorant. The point I am making is that some opinions are better than others, they are more informed.

Nobody's perfect, all of us at one time or another have been close minded or have acted ignorantly. However, as educated people we have a responsibility to think rationally, even on topics that are engulfed by emotional and irrational rhetoric. We all have questions we want answered, but we have to be willing to listen to the answers we get, and evaluate them on the basis of their validity. If we shut ourselves off from dialogue on issues such as religion and homosexuality, we run the risk of being close-minded and ignorant forever.

COURTESY DAVID LEE

Denzel Washington's Jake Shuttlesworth confronts his son Jesus (Ray Allen) in Spike Lee's powerful opus He Got Game.

By Bryan McAllister
Collegian Staff

HE GOT GAME
Directed by Spike Lee
with Denzel Washington, Ray Allen and Milla Jovovich
Playing at Mountain Farms Theaters

Spike Lee proved in 1989's Do the Right Thing that even the most urban of settings — a pizza parlor — can be turned into a tense microcosm where moral dilemmas and social attitudes create powerful drama. In He Got Game, Lee's best film in years and the most engaging study of sports since Hoop Dreams, the out-spoken director angles his camera onto the world of basketball, with results as brutal and explosive as the game itself.

Lee's love for the game is obvious from the opening scenes, but what is especially noteworthy is how he returns basketball to the school yard, back to the kids — black and white, male and female — who grow up with it. Using his uncanny visual abilities, Lee depicts basketball as poetical match of power and speed.

There's so much going on in He Got Game, that the filmmaker sometimes doesn't know where to go. At the core, though, he has a fiery concept: a father-son relationship surrounded by personal politics, selfishness, life-changing decisions and life-changing mistakes. Jake Shuttlesworth (Denzel Washington) is a convicted murderer of his wife, estranged from his family, namely his son Jesus, who also happens to be the number one high school basketball prospect in the country.

We first see Jake shooting hoops on the prison courts, in one of many parallel connections Lee makes to his son. Jake's love has always been basketball, but like his life, he's a wash-out. One day, the state governor makes an offer to Jake: If he's let loose for a week and can persuade his son to attend the governor's alma mater, Big State University, the governor will promise to "do everything in his power" to let Jake out early.

Of course, things are more complicated than that. For one, the details behind Jake's crime are more subtle and timely. His son, meanwhile, has completely rejected his father, and has a bigger decision at hand. Which path will Jesus take — college or straight to the NBA? And if college, which one?

The film has great fun at showing all the temptations thrown at Jesus. Biting clip cameos from the likes of Rick Pitino and Charles Barkley highlight an ESPN "SportsCenter" reel while he gets offers from sports agents, advice from coaches and even opinions from his girlfriend and uncle. Everyone wants a piece of Jesus, but no one really understands what he wants.

Perhaps Lee's best talent is to frame a serious drama like this with delicious comedy and invigorating visual storytelling, as well as eliciting strong ensemble performances. Ray Allen, a real-life NBA star of the Bucks, plays Jesus with a natural smoothness you wouldn't expect from an athlete.

Keeping the picture balanced, though, is Washington, at his finest since Courage Under Fire. You hardly notice as Washington transforms Jake from dignified to pitiful to dignified again. It's a spectacular, award-worthy performance.

If there's a flaw to the film, it namely comes in a subplot involving Jake's relationship to a hooker-next-door, played by Milla Jovovich. Lee sometimes tries to cram too much in — the film barely pulls off a two-main char-

So Far shows Congdon's talents

By Julie Fialkow

SO FAR
Rand Theater
April 30

The characters in Constance Congdon's play, So Far, which premiered April 30 at Rand Theater, are poster-children for the term "dysfunctional family. So Far is like a post-apocalypse "Jerry Springer Show" - an evil, prophetic mom, a sister pregnant by her long lost brother, a son that murders his father, a brash sister who is discovering her own sexuality and a robot/father-figure who was created to please the menopausal mom's sexual desires.

Constance Congdon, a UMass alumni, has won critical acclaim for her 1990 play, Tales of the Lost Formicans about a family lost in suburbia. The Village Voice has praised Congdon for her unique vision.

"Constance Congdon's [voice] has a freshness of spirit, with a humor and charm so distinctively individual, that one just wants more and more from her," the Voice said.

So Far, which was presented by the Department of Theater and directed by Ed Golden, opens with the sound of eery wind and the scene of bleakness and mayhem. The set, designed by Loren Mochari, looks like a tornado struck, with a mound of lawn chairs, grocery baskets, and general rubbish. The effect is dark and sad, and sets the perfect mood for the story.

The first character to appear is Redmond, played by Uzay Turner. Redmond is self-taught in mastery of the English language, and is constantly exercising his extensive vocabulary. Turner expertly portrays the transformation from boy to man that Redmond makes in the course of the play.

Redmond has a love/hate relationship with his younger sister Beartha, played by Bonita A. Oliver. Beartha thinks she's a soldier, fighting against the unknown and wearing a helmet just in case. Oliver brings an explosive energy and sense of humor that keeps the play from getting too weighed down. As soon as she runs across the stage with a chainsaw in her hand, it becomes obvious that the character of Beartha is the most dynamic.

The other sibling in the family is Rainy, a sweet "mama's girl," who constantly is praying to "Dog," their spiritual keeper. During one scene in the play, Rainy, performed by Teri Parker, crouches down and prays in front of an alter comprised of bones and seven soda cans. At one moment she picks up one of the soda cans and points to it, "See, it says 'redemption'."

The matriarch of the family, Mama, portrayed by hdye Al-Bilali, is constantly having what she calls, "menopausal eliptic reasonings." She is bound to a wheelchair by choice, not necessity, and tells it like it is about her family, her ex- husband, and her libido. Al-Bilali, fantastictly portrays Mama as evil, eccentric, but strangely likeable.

Mama's love robot Chet (Brian Quinn), aims to please his master, but his emotions are far from machine-like, he expresses the need to be a father-figure to Mama's children. One of the most humorous scenes in the play involves him and Mama role-playing for a sexual tryst, him as "Roberto," her south-of-the-border lover.

Father, played by Daniel J. Popowich is a mad-man, robust and macho, to say the least. He unexpectedly reenters the lives of the family, and creates a violent stir. Popowich is perfect as the Neanderthal father, and shows many "sides" of himself.

Harry LaCoste plays XXXX, somewhat of a "lady's man," winning the affection of both Rainy and Beartha. He slithers and sneaks around with an air of mystery, that makes the surprise he reveals towards the conclusion of the play, even more disconcerting.

Overall Congdon has again proved herself to be a playwriter who knows no boundaries, who is able to reach past all the normal conventions and tricks of playwriting. One of Congdon's and director Golden's many talents utilized in So Far is the ability to add humor to a rather experimental piece, in order to keep it in touch with the audience. Warning: if you don't like sexual innuendos and a little bit of good sleaze, you're a liar and should go see So Far as soon as possible.

So Far is playing May 5-9 at 8 p.m. in the Rand Theater. Tickets are $7 for the general public, and $4 for students and seniors. Tickets can be picked up at the Fine Arts Center Box office

UMass featured at Film Festival

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

The 5th annual Five College Film and Video Festival took place Saturday, May 2 at 8 p.m. in Stirn Auditorium at Amherst College. The program, organized by the Five College Film Council, displayed a showcase of student video and film productions ranging from narrative and experimental genre.

The Film Council consisted of Five College faculty members Crystal Griffith, Patricia Galvis-Assmus, Don Levine and two students. These organized council members elected the winning film and videos displayed during the evening based on categories such as "experimental," "experimental narrative" and "experimental documentary." The winning selections in each category were awarded with $100 dollars, and one winner was awarded with five rolls of Kodak film stock donated by UMass.

Of those participating were six University of Massachusetts students, four Hampshire College students, one Amherst College student and a Smith College student.

Smith College student Kate Hardy, who helped organize the event, commented on the purpose of the evening.

"I think it's a good opportunity for students to have their work viewed by the community, and it works as an incentive for students to improve their works," Hardy said.

The presentation of This Red Envelope, a film by Hardy portraying the story of two lovers torn apart by symbolic use of a red envelope, won an award for the "experimental narrative" category.

UMass student D.J. Carey produced a film called Testing, in which he displayed a "dreamy" experience of travelling along a dark road that was metamorphical of his own experiences travelling "the road of life." This was his first opportunity to participate in the film festival, and he was excited to be displaying his work.

Other displayed productions included UMass student Jesse Gordon's production of Ordinary Superheroes which mocked fictitious superheroes against modern "unknown" heroes amidst the UMass campus. Gordon and his co-partner dressed up as caped crusaders and raced around UMass in spandex asking people where they could fight crime.

"We were running around UMass half-naked, and it was a real spectacle — people were honking at us," Gordon said.

The winning video in the "experimental documentary" category was UMass student Stacey Lennard's production of Cassini: Countdown to Crisis. The film documented the launching of the Cassini space probe into space a few years ago. The probe had already been launched when Lennard developed an interest over the issue. The probe is destined to make a fly-by around earth, but there is debate that the probe may hit earth's atmosphere, releasing tons of plutonium into it.

"I was interested in doing a film that would educate people and raise their awareness on the issue," Lennard said.

Other winning films of the evening were A Taste of Last Night by a group of Hampshire College students and Quentin's Time by Scott Elliot of Amherst College. Other film participants included Andy Rydzewski of UMass, the Somerville Project, and UMass student Jesal Kapadia's Bombay, Amherst which displayed the experience of a Bombay native in downtown Amherst. As Crystal Griffith of the Somerville Project put it, "the best way to critique media is to just do it."

acter juggling act — and these scenes are awkwardly written and acted; simply put, they belong in a different movie.

He Got Game achieves something most sports movies only dream of — a small, heartfelt human drama surrounded by pictures of the beauty of sport. He Got Game does it for basketball. Ultimately, though, it comes down to moral choices that every young man must make. Lee not only puts the ball back in the yards and street-courts where it began, but back in the hands of the youth, hoping they will "do the right thing." B+

Horoscopes

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You are going to have to be careful to avoid the kinds of things that can bring serious danger in your life. Safety is a key concern at this time.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — This is a good day to concentrate more on yourself than usual. Do something special for the one person you have to count on the most.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — A little deception on your part isn't likely to hurt anybody, and could actually serve to tighten a bond between you and someone special.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You must think twice today, and use great care to determine if, indeed, the end does truly justify the means you must employ to reach it.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You're in the mood for an adventure, and someone you know only a little is willing to provide it. Take care you're not merely being reckless.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You and a friend are in it together, but one of you is more concerned with individual success than the other. Get on the same wavelength.

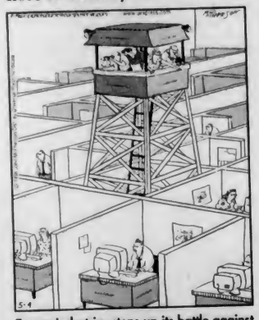
SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — A minor slowdown is sure to give you food for thought, but you may only slow yourself down further by thinking too much about what is obvious.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You may feel as though you're entering a new phase, but the fact is that a familiar endeavor is simply leading you down an unfamiliar path.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — Your tendency toward forward motion will serve you well today. Any obstacles you encounter are best faced directly, not avoided.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — You'll feel today as if you have more in common with others than at any time before. There's something in the air, surely.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You're going to have to choose today between embracing a new start, or striving once again to make an old commitment pay off as you had planned.



ARIES (March 21–April 19) — That which you most fear is not likely to be an issue today — though you may encounter something that reminds you of your limitations.

Strawberry is once again ready to play

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Darryl Strawberry isn't looking back, and who can blame him?

In 1991, he was at the top of the baseball world, an eight-time All-Star with a World Series ring, 280 career homers and a $20 million contract. He was just 29, and 500 homers seemed probable. 600 possible.

Cooperstown? He certainly seemed to be headed there.

Then came injuries, alcohol, cocaine and a trip to the Betty Ford Center.

It got worse: a federal conviction on tax charges, a 60-day suspension following a positive drug test, more trips to court over spousal support payments, more injuries.

No major league team wanted him and he wound up with the St. Paul Saints in the Northern League. And when the Yankees finally did sign him, he was injured more often than not.

Fast forward to this spring. Those biceps are bulging again. The fans are chanting "Dar-ryl" again.

The power is back in his bat. And the ego-driven attitude is gone.

"I don't want to be a star," he said. "I just want to be a player. I had my days of what they call stardom. That's not important to me. What's important to me is to enjoy my life and help other people who are having problems."

The 36-year-old outfielder had a team-leading seven homers following his grand slam in Saturday night's 12-6 win at Kansas City. His .345 average was second on the all-star packed roster, his 18 RBIs were third, and he won a player of the week award for the first time in seven years.

Strawberry is a threat once again.

"Rather than look back at what I could have accomplished, I look at what I do today and what I have left," he said. "If I can continue to focus on that, I think I can accomplish a lot before it's over."

Yankees manager Joe Torre noticed the difference as soon as spring training started in February. Strawberry had worked hard recovering from knee surgery, and molded his body into its leanest, most-chiseled form in years.

"When I saw that this spring, I was encouraged and felt he was back totally," Torre said.

In the 1980s, Strawberry was the stud the New York Mets built their team around. Along with Gary Carter, Keith Hernandez and Dwight Gooden, he led the Mets to the World Series title in 1986 and an NL East championship in 1988.

Sick of pressure from fans and the tabloids, he left New York after the 1990 season and signed with Los Angeles. But because of his drug and alcohol problems the Dodgers released him in 1994, and the San Francisco Giants axed him following the positive drug test the next year.

By the time he returned to the majors with the Yankees in July 1996, his personality seemed to be changing, but there was a trace of bitterness. Playing in the Northern League, his salary was down to $2,000 a month as he tried to attract interest from major league teams.

"St. Paul was a very humbling experience for me," he has said. "It allowed me to find out who I am as a person. It allowed me to have no pride. It showed me baseball was fun again."

He had flashes of brilliance: a three-homer game against Kansas City in August 1996, two homers against Baltimore in Game 4 of that year's AL championship series and a three-run homer the following day in the pennant clincher.

But he had just 28 at-bats over 11 games in 1997, and spent nearly the entire offseason on a rehabilitation program at the Yankees' complex in Tampa, Fla. While not predicting a "monster year," as he often did when he played for the Mets, he said he would surprise people with a 25-homer, 100-RBI season.

"He's still has a lot of talent and a lot of ability," said teammate David Cone, also a teammate on the Mets for four seasons. "He's been a perfect fit and a model citizen. He's done a great job."

It was 1991 when Strawberry last topped 20 homers, and 1990 when he last reached 100 RBIs. Looking back at those numbers is a reminder at what could have been.

"No regrets," he said, "because they were part of life's mistakes. We learn from our life's mistakes and we move forward. I've made these mistakes, and hopefully you can correct it and move on."

Softball captures 4th straight A–10 crown

Henderson sets record for strikeouts in series

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

Danielle Henderson showed why she was named the Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Year for the second consecutive year by setting a new conference record for championship series strikeouts as the UMass softball team captured its fourth A–10 title in a row at Rhode Island.

The Minutewomen downed Virginia Tech 3–1 in the championship yesterday. UMass beat the Hokies, 8–0, in the teams' first series game and dropped St. Joseph's, 3–0, to advance to the finals. Virginia Tech topped Dayton and the Hawks for the honor of facing UMass.

Henderson, who was named the tournament's Most Outstanding Player, tied another record — which she set Saturday — with 16 Ks in yesterday's final game. She did not walk a batter.

Henderson has a perfect 8–0 record in the conference championships and with her performance this weekend broke the 800-strikeout plateau. Her 365 Ks this season rank ninth on the NCAA's all-time single season list, two behind South Carolina's Trinity Johnson, who fanned 367 in 1995.

Henderson, designated player Kelly Buckley, first baseman Kim Gutridge, catcher Nicole Faessler and outfielder Tracey Osier were all named to the All-Championship team.

After the Minutewomen staked themselves to a 1–0 lead in the bottom of the fifth inning as Mandy Galas scored on Virginia Tech's error, the Hokies came back to tie things up in the top of the next frame. Shortstop Michelle Meadows, who was named to the all-tourney team for Vermont, drove in a run off a double to left.

UMass freshman Annie Smith returned the favor with a double to center in the next half of the inning that brought in Becky George and Buckley for the win.

With the win in the championship, UMass ties a record for wins in a season with their 40–12 mark. The Minutewomen will now face America East champion Hofstra in an NCAA play–in doubleheader Thursday at 2:30 p.m. If the Minutewomen and Flying Dutchwomen split the games, a deciding contest will be played on May 8 at Dutch Diamond in Hempstead, N.Y.

On Saturday, Henderson picked up a win with her 20th shutout of the season as the Minutewomen beat St. Joe's in the semifinals. Faessler drilled a solo home run and Gutridge was 2–for–3 with a double and an RBI to fire UMass' offense.

The Hokies advanced the yesterday's game after beating both Dayton and St. Joseph's.

Brown walks away with win, UM's postseason

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

An inspired effort by the Brown men's lacrosse team proved to be too much for Massachusetts to contain as the Minutemen dropped their final regular season game — and with it their tournament hopes — in a 14–7 defeat.

Brown	14
Massachusetts	7

Coming into the game, the Bears sported a 3–9 record that belied the team's talent, while UMass stood at 7–4 and hoping to make a case to the NCAA tournament selection show.

What resulted was a first half that epitomized the UMass– Brown rivalry and a second half in which the Bears atoned for their less than spectacular season.

"You've got to give a lot of credit to Brown, they played well," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "But we had plenty of opportunities that we didn't connect on."

UMass did hit paydirt on its very first chance when Jeff Seals grabbed the opening faceoff and fed Mike DelPercio, who one–timed the ball past Brown goaltender Strider Dickson at 14:53.

Brown responded three minutes later as Jed Dewick tallied the first of his six on the afternoon.

Jay Negus gave UMass another edge with just over six minutes remaining in the first quarter, but again Dewick returned the favor. With 3:07 left, DelPercio tacked on his second goal with a sidearm shot out of traffic to finish the opening period scoring.

Still, the goal total didn't accurately reflect the control UMass had in the first quarter. The Minutemen put 19 shots on Dickson but only walked away with a trio of goals, a fact that got a one–word reaction from Cannella.

"Wow," he said, shaking his head.

Unfortunately for the Minutemen, the first quarter represented the most cohesive offensive surge of the afternoon. In the second frame, DelPercio beat Dickson again and Alex Racioppi fired home a shot while crossing in front of the goal. That was all UMass could muster until six minutes into the final quarter.

Tournament picture doesn't include UM

By Brett Mauser

The lesson learned from the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team's 14–8 loss to Brown is to never underestimate the power of a heated rivalry. Despite having a 3–9 record, all that was really needed was a loose attitude and an all–out performance on senior day.

Midway through the year, playing in the NCAA tournament could have been taken for granted after moving to 6–0 with a 10–4 victory over the Army Cadets. Then the power of college lacrosse came to town in the form of Duke, with the Blue Devils embarrassing the Minutemen in front of a packed house winning 15–4. From then on, the wind died down and the sail stood still. As the Minutemen stood in place, they fell behind the rest of the field, eventually falling out of contention for one of the 12 bids in the tournament.

With the absence of UMass (7–5) in the brackets announced yesterday comes the end of nine fine careers on the Amherst campus, including the entire starting defense. The midfield will also have its holes upon the graduation of co–captains Mike DelPercio and P.G. Massey, assist leader Chris Martens and Chris Robbins. Spot attackman Henry Bankhead to sophomore wide receiver Torey Hamilton to give the White squad a 6–0 lead after the point after was blocked. Maroon responded in the second frame after Seibert hit Jim Pizano from 35 yards out.

Seibert found redshirt freshman Eric Bross for a 35–yard touchdown to extend Maroon's lead to 13–6. Maroon's Jamie Holston then put the game out of reach by scampering for 64 yards up the middle.

Spring game marks the beginning of Mark Whipple era

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

In football, there's never enough practice time. After last year's 2–9 record, the arrival of coach Mark Whipple from Brown has installed new-found life in the Massachusetts football team.

The big hits and the acrobatic catches are miles down the road, but it all kicked off on Saturday at the annual spring game at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

Whipple, who is one of football's most renowned offensive minds, has jumpstarted the Minuteman offense with a wide–open aerial attack and a new attitude.

The two squads combined for 513 yards passing, spreading the field for the running game the Minutemen perennially bring to the table, as Maroon defeated White 19–13.

The Minutemen eclipsed the 19–point–mark only twice all of last season, both losses.

Whipple's first recruiting class should add numerous changes to the everyday lineup, especially in the mold of junior college transfer Todd Bankhead, who looks to have a step on junior Jeff Smith and freshman Kelly Seibert for the starting quarterback position. Bankhead struggled in his first action, connecting on only 6–of–23 passes for 183 yards and a touchdown. Smith saw the most action of the day, making the most of it, completing on 18–of–37 attempts for 185 yards and a touchdown.

Last year, the air game was the worst in the Atlantic 10 conference, being doubled up by opponents in yardage and tripled in touchdowns. This all included a 10–yard performance in a 49–6 loss to Maine.

The scoring opened with a 92–yard touchdown pass in the first quarter from

Peace talks stalled with blockade dispute

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan (AP) — A dispute over blockades hemming in thousands of malnourished Afghans on Sunday broke down peace talks that had come tantalizingly close to ending two decades of bitter conflict.

"They have been suspended indefinitely," said James Ngobe, the U.N. representative at the troubled talks.

The Taliban militia, which wants a ruling government of Islamic scholars in place before the blockades are lifted, accused U.N. mediators of favoring its northern alliance enemies, who want the blockades brought down immediately.

The northern-based opposition ostensibly walked out of the talks to protest the Taliban's decision to reduce its negotiating team from five to one — but it was clear that the roadblocks were at the center of the dispute.

Suit claims Macy's negligence in accident

NEW YORK (AP) — A spectator who was injured when a giant balloon at the Macy's Thanksgiving Day Parade went out of control sued the department store yesterday for $395 million.

Kathleen Caronna, 34, was in a coma for almost a month after a hunk of metal struck her in the head when fierce wind sent the Cat in the Hat balloon careening into a lamppost as she watched the parade.

The state Supreme Court lawsuit, which also names the city as a defendant, claims Macy's was careless, reckless and negligent in its operation of the Nov. 27 parade and disregarded the dangers to the public.

Debris rained on Mrs. Caronna and other spectators just moments after she handed her baby son to her husband. At least three other people were injured but not as seriously as Mrs. Caronna, who suffered a fractured skull, brain damage and impaired vision. Mrs. Caronna, a brokerage house compliance officer, has returned home from the Kessler Institute, a rehabilitation facility in East Orange, N.J.Dpolice and transportation departments, and others, including companies that built and wired the lamppost.

Ronnie Taffet, Macy's vice president for public relations, and David Goldin, a lawyer for the city, wouldn't comment.

UM Alliance Queer Fest highlights GLBT pride

By Anna Feder
Collegian Staff

Despite Thursday's heat, festivities for this year's Queer Fest proceeded with all due enthusiasm on the University of Massachusetts campus pond lawn.

The event, which was hosted by Pride Alliance and the Stonewall Center was an oasis of music, poetry, theater, information and accessories which ran from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m.

The performances were hosted by Connie Lingus. The UMass Theater Guild presented a scene from their upcoming play Angels in America which is opening this Thursday. Also in the line–up was local folk singer Linee who played songs from her first full–length CD, Hard Questions. Linee has opened for Jewel and Ani DiFranco and recently won the WHMP Battle of the Bands.

Among the many attractions were games aimed at poking fun at various public figures. For a dollar one could test their pitching skills playing "dunk the politician" and potentially soak a stand in for Pat Buchanan or Newt Gingrich. The Social Thought and Political Economy Department, another sponsor, hosted "pin the tail on the homophobe," by sticking a pride flag on Senator Jesse Helms.

The evening events, which took place in the campus center ballroom began later than expected with a drag show. The Grotto Boys began and ended the set with popular Village People covers. Among the highlights were performances of Bjork's "It's Oh So Quiet" by Kira Bombshell and Radiohead's "Creep" by the Grotto Drag King.

The next event was a bachelor charity auction to raise funds for Gay and Lesbian Advocacy and Defenders, a pro bono legal group that represents individuals who are discriminated against or harassed. All fifteen bachelors were auctioned off raising almost five hundred dollars for the cause. The bachelors and their dates attended a private party generously hosted by the Grotto Friday night.

Among the auctionees was Sharon, one of the Grotto Boys and an expensive date who was purchased for $90. "It's for a good cause so I feel good [about it]. I'm having a good time," Sharon said.

The day's events ended with a semi–formal dance which lasted until 1 a.m., with D.J. Dave Keating playing techno and 70's music. Five College students and community members danced side–by–side to celebrate GLBT Pride.

Kate Geyer, a junior philosophy major and the social Chair of the Pride Alliance was pleased with the outcome of Queer Fest. "It was a really positive event, the whole community got involved. We think it went really well. We basically started from scratch. Now we feel we have an event we can put on every year," Geyer said.

Unabomber sentenced; families react

By Linda Deutsch
Associated Press

SACRAMENTO, Calif. — Unflinching and unrepentant, Unabomber Theodore Kaczynski was given four life sentences yesterday as the families of his victims prayed aloud for his eternal damnation and demanded that he be locked up "so far down that when he dies he'll be closer to hell."

"He's diabolical, evil, cunning, a murderer," said Susan Mosser, whose husband, Thomas Mosser, died before her eyes in New Jersey after he opened a bomb sent by Kaczynski.

The outcome of the sentencing was never in doubt: U.S. District Judge Garland Burrell Jr. gave the 55-year-old former mathematician four life sentences plus 30 years, as spelled out in a plea bargain reached in January. Kaczynski's plea spared him the death penalty and a trial in which his lawyers planned to portray him as mentally ill, which he denied.

When given a chance to address the court, Kaczynski, the man whose 35,000-word manifesto against the evils of technology filled eight newspaper pages, spoke only briefly, offering no apologies and no explanations.

He strode to a courtroom lectern and, in a high-pitched nasal voice, complained that the government had lied about his anti-technology philosophy and was "discrediting me personally." "I ask only that people reserve judgment on me and the Unabomber case," Kaczynski said. He said he would explain his motives at a future time.

In imposing the sentence, the judge said, "The defendant committed unspeakable and monstrous crimes for which he shows utterly no remorse." He added that he feared Kaczynski would try to kill again if not closely watched.

The Unabomber, so named because he targeted university professors and airlines as well as others in his anti-technology terrorist campaign, killed three men and injured 29 others in 16 attacks between 1978 and 1995.

The attacks ended with Kaczynski's capture at his Montana shack in April 1996. He was caught after his brother notified the FBI that Kaczynski's letters bore a resemblance to the Unabomber manifesto published under pressure in The Washington Post. The plea bargain covered the three deaths and the maimings of two scientists. As part of the plea bargain, Kaczynski acknowledged responsibility for all of the Unabomber attacks.

He will be sent to a high-security federal prison, possibly in Lompoc or in Colorado.

At the sentencing, six of the Unabomber survivors came forward to describe their grief, pain and anger. Most sat in the witness box, face-to-face with the man they addressed as "Ted" and denounced as the personifi-

Annual GLBT March mixes advocacy & arts

By Dylan Larke
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — The 17th annual Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, and Transgender (GLBT) Pride March stepped off at noon from Craft Avenue last Saturday afternoon.

GLBT people and their heterosexual allies marched to the Tri–county fairground arena rally site where vendors, 13 speakers and performers entertained marchers until 4 p.m.

Five University of Massachusetts affiliated GLBT groups marched in the parade from the Stonewall Center; both the undergraduate and graduate GLBT groups, Queer Peer Education, and the special housing 2 in 20 Floor for GLBT and ally students participated in the march.

At the Tri–county fairground arena, The Grotto Girrrls were first to go on stage. The Grotto Girrrls are five dancers who perform on Wednesday nights at the Grotto, a Northampton night club.

Northampton Mayor Mary Ford then read her proclamation declaring Northampton Pride the official day of recognition for GLBT persons in the city.

Later, 14–year–old Nicholas Carman spoke about his experiences of being a multi–racial and transgender male to female youth. Carman, an eighth grade honor student in Springfield, enjoys sports, singing, and music, and is "out" both at home and in school.

John Cobbins II, a 17–year–old, multi–racial bisexual young man in 10th grade at the Science and Technology High School in Springfield, spoke next. Cobbins, who came out at 15, spoke of his experiences.

"Coming out has been hard, but worth it," Cobbins said. Cobbins, who lives in foster care with two gay men, is an activist who speaks to students across Massachusetts on GLBT issues.

Next to speak was Valerie Yanford, a 20–year–old black/white and lesbian/bi–curious cosmetologist, who lives in Springfield. Yanford, originally from a rural town, has spoken through numerous speaking bureaus across Massachusetts and identifies herself as an outspoken, multi– pierced political activist within the GLBT community.

Following Yanford was Linee, a local musician who has just produced and recorded her first full length CD, Hard Questions and has also played at numerous colleges and clubs across New England. Linee has shared stages with Jewel, Ani Difranco and Jonathan Brooke.

Linee recently performed at the UMass Queer Fest '98 and the Berkshire Stonewall Community Coalition Festival. Linee will be performing at this year's Washington, D.C. Pride March on June 7th.

Peace talks continuing in Britain; Albright extends sessions

By Karin Laub
Associated Press

LONDON — Mideast peace talks teetered between breakdown and breakthrough yesterday, with Yasser Arafat declaring "today is the day, now is the moment" as Secretary of State Madeleine Albright met separately with him and Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Albright scheduled extra rounds of separate talks with the Israeli and Palestinian leaders.

"We are hoping for the best and preparing for the worst," Albright's spokesman, James P. Rubin said, before Albright entered her second meeting of the day with Netanyahu.

"Clearly the timetable has been extended," Rubin said. "We are ever so slightly more hopeful."

But he told reporters that "we do not have compelling evidence the meetings will yield a breakthrough" and warned of "grave risks of disillusionment and violence in the Middle East." Netanyahu, who began the day saying he did not expect much progress, softened his tune after an unexpectedly long 4 1/2-hour meeting with the secretary of state.

"We want to bring about a breakthrough. We also want to bring about an end to the suffering and the conflict between the two peoples," Netanyahu said.

The talks were not scheduled to include direct face-to-face discussions between Netanyahu and Arafat. They first met separately with British Prime Minister Tony Blair, who was hosting the meetings, and then in turn with Albright, the principal mediator. Arafat agreed to an Albright request to remain an extra day in London so that the Americans can try to achieve a breakthrough, said Nabil Shaath, the Palestinian planning minister. He said Arafat "most likely" would meet Albright again yesterday later in the day. Another Palestinian negotiator, Saeb Erekat, claimed that Netanyahu "presented nothing whatsoever" in his talks with Albright and was simply drawing out the process.

Arafat looked grim as he returned to his hotel after a 90-minute session with Albright during the afternoon.

As the morning began, Netanyahu and Arafat drove in separate motorcades in brilliant sunshine, moving swiftly through the British capital.

Outside Blair's Downing Street office, rival protesters shouted at each other. A few dozen Arab demonstrators waved black flags and banners with slogan "Peace process go to hell!" and chanted "God is great!"

Five yards away, a small group of pro-Israelis shouted back, "Give peace a chance!"

Initial discussions were thought to center on a U.S. proposal for Israel to withdraw from an additional 13 percent of the West Bank. Israeli officials at first indicated no more than nine percent of the land could be ceded to the Palestinians, but recently indicated Netanyahu may agree to 11 percent, beyond 27 percent already turned over.

Arafat has said if he does not get what he wants through negotiations, he will declare Palestinian statehood unilaterally next May.

Netanyahu's comments suggested that he and Albright had explored a different formula, perhaps one that would advance areas other than the land dispute.

Netanyahu said he and Albright had discussed a wide range of topics, and added that some issues would have to be referred to the Israeli Cabinet.

Hard-line Israeli parliament members have threatened to try to oust Netanyahu if he gives away more than the agreed 9 percent of the West Bank.

Asked whether he might meet directly with Arafat rather than negotiating through Albright, Netanyahu said: "We are all here in the same town. Physically it is possible. All three of us have to judge the benefit of such a meeting."

The two last met in October.

Arafat offered little hint of a breakthrough after a morning session with Blair.

"For the moment, no progress yet," Arafat told reporters as he left Downing Street. He criticized Netanyahu for continuing to allow new Jewish settlements on the occupied West Bank, and urged him to accept the American withdrawal plan.

cation of evil.

"I lost my innocence to this man, and I fight daily to find the carefree happiness... that was taken from me," sobbed Gary Wright, who was maimed by a bomb he opened in 1987 in Salt Lake City and still finds shards of shrapnel in his skin.

Geneticist Dr. Charles Epstein, who lost some of his hearing and part of his hand in a Unabomber attack, bitterly addressed Kaczynski's decision to accept a plea bargain, calling him a coward out to save his own neck.

"I reject the notion that your mental state excuses what you did," he said. "By some convoluted form of logic, you were portrayed as a victim of a prosecutor who would see a deranged man put to death."

Epstein's wife, Dr. Lois Epstein, also a Harvard-educated physician, invoked the biblical precepts of her Jewish faith. For those he blinded, she said, "may your eyes be blinded by darkness to the incredible beauty of the sun, the moon and the stars." And for those who lost their hearing, "may you become deaf as your eardrums implode from stony silence."

"And may your eventual death occur in the way you lived, in a solitary manner, without compassion or love," Mrs. Epstein said. Mrs. Mosser told the judge: "Lock him so far down that when he dies he'll be closer to hell, where the devil belongs."

David Gelernter, a Yale University computer scientist who lost part of a hand, did not appear. He sent a written statement in which he said Kaczynski should have been put to death.

"We took the easy way out," he said, "by deciding to let him live. He is in the same category as plague and cancer, creating widows and orphans."

He and other victims praised Kaczynski's brother, David, for turning in his brother. During the hearing, the defendant never looked at his brother.

Susan Mc Dougal faces more time in jail; refuses to answer questions

By Pete Yost
Associated Press

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. — Former Whitewater partner Susan McDougal was charged yesterday with three felonies for refusing to tell a grand jury what she knows about the first family's business dealings, including a previously undisclosed check she marked with the words "Payoff Clinton."

The indictment was handed down by a grand jury here that is wrapping up two years of Whitewater-related investigation. It threatens to punish Ms. McDougal with years more of prison time for her feisty and high-profile campaign to refuse answering prosecutors' questions.

Ms. McDougal, 43, was charged with two counts of criminal contempt for refusing to answer grand jury questions in September 1996 and again last month, and one count of obstruction of justice. Her lawyer vowed to take the case to trial, and to use such a trial to examine recent allegations that one of the prosecution witnesses in an earlier case against his client had been paid by conservative critics of President and Mrs. Clinton.

"She is not going to be bullied by them," attorney Mark Geragos said, insisting he would subpoena Independent Counsel Kenneth Starr and his top deputy as witnesses.

Starr spokesman Charles Bakaly said Mrs. McDougal had been granted immunity from prosecution in exchange for her testimony and had no legal grounds for refusing a judge's order to cooperate. "There is not a constitutional right not to answer questions," he said, also accusing the president of "injecting" himself into the highly public feud between prosecutors and Ms. McDougal with comments he made in interviews.

That allegation drew a sharp retort from Clinton's private attorney.

Starr "through his public relations officer, has seen fit to assert that the president somehow improperly injected himself into the investigation," David Kendall said. "This claim is wholly false."

"The president's statements have been both accurate and appropriate," the lawyer added. "It is for the public to judge what the independent counsel's motivations may be."

Starr issued a statement saying the indictment did not accuse the president of wrongdoing, but court documents attached to the indictment revealed previously undisclosed evidence affecting Clinton.

In videotaped testimony submitted in 1996 during Mrs. McDougal's first trial, Clinton testified under oath in 1996 he never had any loans or financial dealings with the failed Madison Guaranty Savings & Loan owned by McDougal and her late ex-husband, James. The indictment includes a partial transcript of Mrs. McDougal's last grand jury appearance in which she was confronted by prosecutors with a $5,081.82 check she signed over to Madison Guaranty that was marked "payoff Clinton."

The check from August 1983 was drawn on a McDougal account and paid to the S&L that eventually failed, the court record said. "Since your last appearance before the grand jury in September 1996 we have been able to obtain a copy of this check and confirm it's your handwriting on the check. You signed this check, correct?" a Starr prosecutor asked.

"May I go out and see my attorney?" Ms. McDougal asked. Prosecutors do not say in the indictment what they believe the check was for, but indicated the reason they were interested in it was because it related to Clinton's videotaped testimony in 1996. "We have more checks that we could show you if you would like to see those," the Starr prosecutor is quoted as saying in the transcript.

Displaying the feistiness she has shown in her public attacks on Whitewater prosecutors, McDougal answered back: "I'll see anything you got. I won't answer your questions."

Outside the courthouse where the indictment was handed down, Bakaly also asserted that the president, through the White House counsel, turned down repeated requests from prosecutors that he personally urge Mrs. McDougal to cooperate.

"The Office of Independent Counsel requested that the president urge his former business partner, Mrs. McDougal, to testify truthfully before the grand jury. That request was rejected," Bakaly said.

White House Counsel Charles F.C. Ruff said Monday it was "reckless and irresponsible" to suggest it was Clinton's job to urge Ms. McDougal to do anything. "The president has always urged everyone to tell the truth. At the same time, he understands that it is not appropriate for him to intervene personally in this matter," Ruff said.

VW's new Beetle an exciting and safe ride for everyone

By Catherine Strong
Associated Press

RUCKERSVILLE, Va. — Volkswagen's New Beetle, a car that's already turning heads on the street and luring nostalgic motorists into showrooms, has something else to boast about. It's rated one of the safest cars in its class.

In both low-speed and high-speed crash tests, a crash-research institute confirmed the New Beetle as its "best pick" for safety in the small-car class.

That's a far cry from the original Beetle, which — however much people loved it for reliability and low cost — had a reputation as a tin can in accidents.

"The old Beetle may have had a lot of character, but it had a lot of safety problems. This is not the old Beetle. They've changed their image when it comes to safety," said Brian O'Neill, president of the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety.

The institute, which is backed by insurers, is releasing films at a news conference Monday of two 40 mph crash tests of the Beetle done last month at its sprawling crash-test center in Ruckersville, 90 miles south of Washington.

With an overall "good" rating, the Beetle rated higher than the 11 other small cars crash-tested by the institute in recent years. Most of those cars — including the Honda Civic, Toyota Corolla and Ford Escort — were rated only "acceptable" on safety. Volkswagen spokesman Tony Fouladpour said the positive crash test results may help spur even more sales of the popular Bug, which has become a smash hit since its reintroduction in the United States this year. Reports abound of waiting lists hundreds of names long and of cars selling for thousands of dollars above the sticker price.

Fouladpour said VW wants to prove that the car offers more than a nostalgic ride. "We knew how important it was to make sure the car was incorporating the best safety technology that we had," he said.

The first Beetle crash test at the Ruckersville center on a recent afternoon left its metallic blue front end smashed and its hood buckled but its passenger compartment largely intact. "This is almost as good as it gets," said O'Neill, peering into the front compartment. "It's much better than any small car tested."

The Beetle's head restraint was rated good, allowing no head injuries. Its air bags and seat belt system were rated acceptable in both tests.

On the first test, the driver-side air bag inflated well, then deflated a bit too quickly when used in combination with a seat belt system that allows some slack in a crash to prevent rib injuries. The air bag-seat belt system managed the crash energy in a way that indicated the possibility of minor head injury in an accident, O'Neill said.

"This is the balancing act (between seat belts and air bags) manufacturers like Volkswagen are trying to deal with," O'Neill said.

At Volkswagen's request, however, the Beetle was retested with an air bag with smaller vent holes. It fared better, O'Neill said. The second test also included a new headrest that locks in place in several settings.

Both the new headrest and air bag will be in Beetles coming off the production line next month.

Since the institute aims to get auto makers to improve their designs, engineers at the crash center readily agreed to the second test with the improved safety equipment.

In a set of tests on the Beetle's bumper at 5 mph, the kind of crash that happens frequently in traffic, there was only $134 worth of damage — the best result of any 1997-98 small car tested by the institute. Most small cars racked up over $1,000 in damages. Those results were released last Monday.

21: the false standard

For most college students, 21 is the magic number because life changes dramatically after their twenty-first birthday. Gone are the days of brown paper bags and suspiciously clinking backpacks. Gone are the days of licenses from Nebraska featuring photographs of people who might look something like you if you were an entirely different person. Gone are the days of being called a kid.

I think it's unfortunate that the milestone into adulthood is marked primarily by the ability to buy and drink an alcoholic beverage in a public place. Drinking alcohol is not what differentiates children or teens from adults, although being responsible while drinking does separate people. However, how people behave around alcohol has more to do with maturity and biochemistry than it has to do with age.

For example, last Thursday night I was in a coffee shop in Northampton with friends, and a drunk man wandered in. He proceeded to sit with us and tell vulgar jokes about pigs and tattoos on a woman's inner thighs, which weren't funny because they were so confusing. My friend kept offering him a ride home to prevent him from driving but he insisted that he lived close by and would walk. He also said that he had driven drunk many times and had been pulled over by cops for driving under the influence.

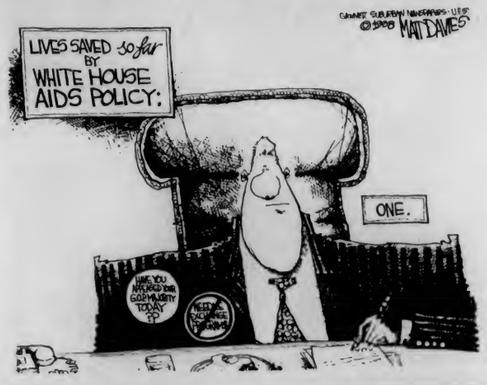
"I think it's unfortunate that the milestone into adulthood is marked primarily by the ability to buy and drink an alcoholic beverage in a public place."

Contrast that man with me, someone half his age, who can't go into a bar and order a white Russian in the United States because I can't baudle myself while drinking alcohol, according to the law. What is frustrating to me also is that I have been drinking alcoholic beverages at mealtimes with my family since I was a child and I have never acted as foolishly as the man from Northampton did that night and many nights previously, according to what he told us about his personal life.

American college students love going to foreign countries like Mexico and Canada, or to Europe, where the drinking age is "only 18" or "only 16" in some cases. I don't know what the statistics are for these countries in terms of Driving Under the Influence (D.U.I.) convictions, alcohol related deaths and rates of alcoholism, but I do know that their approach to alcohol consumption is somewhat different from our own.

Most Europeans consume gallons of alcohol per year, often with their meals. Most of the young people in Europe go out to bars and clubs the way that we do in the United States, except that they can drink while they're out at a much younger age.

I think drinking in public at the age of 18 is perfectly acceptable behavior, provided that people have been taught by their families how to handle alcohol in an appropriate way. There are kids who come to college without much drinking experience due to restrictive parents, and they end up learning about alcohol the hard way. There are also kids who come to college with well-established patterns of binge drinking and other less healthy patterns of alcohol consumption and related behavior that they learned from their peers in high school. Unfortunately, some people learn bad habits from their parents as well.



College students have a hard time escaping the presence of alcohol whether they drink or not. Alcohol is a huge part of many people's social lives while in college, despite its illegality for a majority of college students. One reason why alcohol is so big in the college experience is that it is extremely easy to obtain alcohol at school — it's just a matter of knowing a few people.

In terms of college students and the law, the situation is pretty much out of control. Some schools — like Princeton — provide free alcohol. Others, like UMass, engage in a haphazard policy of enforcement of the law and negligence, depending on the cop or the Resident Assistant (RA). As much as UMass tries to control its students in terms of alcohol, it will never, ever succeed in restricting illegal drinking because there is no real reason why people who are 18, 19, and 20 should not drink alcohol.

I think that this country would have a better handle on the situation if we weren't haunted by our Puritanical foundations and the Prohibition movement in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Our country is far removed from the era and ideologies of the Puritans, but the Prohibitionists were fighting, in part at least, against the destructive behaviors of people caused by or related to alcohol.

I have seen my fair share of people who can't handle themselves around alcohol. And I've seen many who can. I think people would behave more responsibly if our culture put less emphasis on how wrong it is to drink and more emphasis on how to drink right and still have a grand old time.

Letters to the Editor

SGA budget unfair to JSU

To the Editor:

I am writing this letter as a final call to action for all students. This past month Hillel's Jewish Student Union has been working with the Senate Ways and Means Committee of the Student Government Association (SGA) to negotiate a fair budget allocation for the next school year. When the proposals first came out, the Jewish Student Union (JSU) received a cut to $6,800 from $9,000, over $2,000 equalling a decrease of 21 percent.

What is more outrageous is that a budget of only $6,800 comes from an entire SGA budget of $960,000. Which means that Hillel's JSU is receiving less than 1 percent of the total allocation in all the Registered Student Organizations (RSO) on campus. The SGA must approve the budget for 18,000 undergraduates. Out of these 18,000 students there exists a population of 3,000 Jews, almost 17 percent. Hillel's JSU has a high-priority goal to open its doors to Jews of all backgrounds. To complete our goals under such a large banner it is necessary for us to have funding that would be somewhat proportional to the amount of students we have on campus. Now certainly you must realize that an allocation of less than 1 percent and a population of 17 percent do not add up.

The JSU is both a religious and cultural group, so it is necessary to compare our allocation with other groups of similar backgrounds. Many religious groups, like the Born Again Students in Christ, Inter-Varsity Christian Fellowship, the Muslim Students Association and Athletes In Action all got additional funding, while the JSU was bitterly cut. African, Latin, Asian, Native American Affairs (ALANA), another cultural group on campus, received $130,000 of the SGA budget, equating to 14 percent of the total budget. And even though the ALANA community represents the same 20 percent of students on campus, they were allocated an amount totally unproportional to the JSU budget. We have no intention of taking away from the budgets of the ALANA caucus, we just wish to have our fair share.

With this great difference in proportion it is necessary to ask why? After our appeal on April 26 it became obvious to me what the problem is. When it comes right down to it, we did not fill our budget request form correctly. Members of each RSO that is requesting funding from the SGA must fill out a budget predicting how each dollar must be spent. In line with the Ways and Means Committee I can see why this is necessary, to a point. The SGA has the right to know how we are using the money. But this prediction must be made some time in March, when all the programming for the year is completed, the planning for the next year has only partially been done. Therefore, this budget proposal becomes a true science. A science that may be understood by the Ways and Means Committee, whose members spend an entire year working budgets. However, the students of the JSU do not focus their attention on the science of budgets; we program events and advocate for 3,000 students, certainly a science and strenuous act within itself. The result of lack of knowledge turns into an isolation between the SGA and any RSO which does not have a strong connection with it. For instance, it is no coincidence that the same agency that got 13 percent of budget allocation also has 20 appointed and automatic seats in the Senate. Aside from political favors, students that share both a Senate seat and a membership in another RSO have a leg-up because they are familiar with the whole complicated system.

Certainly the SGA cannot except every RSO to have one Senator in SGA. You cannot forget that each Senator is elected by students, wherein they have the directive to represent us. Each senator is given the directive represent 250 students, including ones that are in RSO's and those that are Jewish. And of course this directive of representation is carried to the work on the Ways and Means Committee and the work on the budget process. Therefore, although the Jewish Student Union may not know the many ins and outs of the budget process, it can predict a total budget based on our work in the past and our goals for the future. To make up for our ignorance, we have the faith in representation that the members of the Ways and Means committee will continue to help us figure out the exact pieces of this total. This year we were given $9,000 and we spent nearly everything, if you include our last three programs this year which will spend our last $3,000.

This letter serves as one of the last efforts of the JSU to get help from our representatives. Although the committee has basically come to their final decision, we have one more chance. On May 6 the Senate will hold their meeting in the Campus Center at 7 p.m. At this meeting the entire Senate will vote on the whole budget. This letter goes to all Senators, please defeat this detrimental budget. This letter goes to each student on campus. Our last effort therefore becomes an attempt to defeat this act and hope that in open debate our funding will be increased. So what you can do to help is to visit the following website to find out your senator, then contact him or her for added assistance (http://www.umass.edu/rso/sga/people.html).

Minors shut out of Best of UMass

To the editor:

This is just my opinion but I disagree with your form for the Best of UMass. Many students who aren't 21 are at a disadvantage when filling it out. Being only 20, I can't legally go to the bars and recommend the best bar and bartender. So having to fill out at least two-thirds of the form is just a little more difficult for me.

Hey, writers — if you write columns now and want to continue or if you want to start, come to a mandatory meeting this Thursday, May 7, at 7:00 p.m. at the Collegian offices in the Campus Center Basement. Meet next semester's Ed/Op editor, Mike Messaros, and discuss column rotation for the fall. If you have never written for the Collegian before, please bring a 800 word sample column with you. Kwame Ture: reflections on a life of black activism

Testimonial banquet held in honor of former SNCC head

By Hussein Ibish
Collegian Correspondent

Kwame Ture, formerly known as Stokely Carmichael, makes a habit of asserting that, "Once you sacrifice for the people, they will always sacrifice for you." This claim, which otherwise might be dismissed as optimistic sloganeering, has been lent a new veracity by the astonishing outpouring of respect and affection toward Ture in recent months.

The civil rights leader and former head of the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) has been struggling with prostate cancer for the past two years. Ture, who moved to West Africa in the early 1970s, has recently been spending much more time in the United States for treatment. Friends, colleagues and other civil rights activists took the opportunity on Wednesday, April 8 at the Marriot Wardman Park Hotel to honor Ture at "A Hero's Welcome: The Friends of Kwame Ture Testimonial Dinner." The event also served as a fund-raiser to aid Ture in his medical and travel expenses.

The testimonial dinner, the latest in a series of events to honor Ture, was attended by an extraordinary mixture of civil rights heroes and activists, notable figures in the African-American community, and diplomats. By all accounts it was a profound and moving experience, bringing together aging activists from around the nation, many of whom spent their youths in the dangerous but exhilarating civil rights movement as SNCC volunteers.

"It was in many ways a SNCC reunion," UMass Professor Michael Thelwell said. "The incredible affection and love that those people had for each other and the love they had for Ture was palpable in that room."

With that emotional intensity and the central role of the musical performances by the Harambe Singers, "The atmosphere in that room pretty much approximated the kind of atmosphere of a mass meeting during the height of the civil rights movement," Thelwell said.

Those assembled to pay tribute to Ture included many who disagreed with one another and several with long-standing disputes with Ture, most notably U.S. Rep. John Lewis. Lewis was replaced by Carmichael as SNCC chair in 1966 following bitter disputes about the growing influence of nationalist thought in the movement and the need for civil rights workers to defend themselves from attacks by white supremacists. Lewis responded by resigning from SNCC membership.

At the testimonial dinner on April 8, John Lewis sat beside Ture, who appears to have become more frail since his visit to UMass last year. Ture said that he was "deeply touched to see brother John Lewis sitting by my side," an acknowledgment that Lewis had put both personal and ideological differences aside to honor Ture. Ture similarly acknowledged the presence of Minister Louis Farrakhan of the Nation of Islam, who lead the assemblage in a closing prayer.

In his remarks, Ture chose to make his theme the problem of unity in the face of ideological and other differences. Citing the attendance of Lewis, Farrakhan and others who do not join him in calling for a Marxist revolution, Ture insisted that the evening's events demonstrated that unity was both necessary and attainable.

"We must have unity in our community and understand that we can have unity in the widest possible diversity," Ture said. Later on in his statement, Ture underlined the point saying, "We must have unity today in our community, our people are crying out for it... this meeting represents, whether you are aware of it or not, this urge for unity."

Ture contrasted the divisions among African–American leaders with the experiences of other communities and national groups. "Among Palestinians," Ture pointed out, "Hamas can meet with al-Fatah and no one says anything, but if Farrakhan sits down with Julian Bond in the same room, the entire place attracts an explosion of controversy. It's because they do not want our unity."

Ture may have been referring in part to an address made by newly elected National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) Board Chairman Julian Bond at the annual Leadership Conference of the Anti-Defamation League (ADL) on April 6. Bond described Minister Louis Farrakhan as the "most prominent" threat to "cooperation between whites and blacks, Jews and gentiles," because of his "increasingly vocal anti-Semitism."

Ture said that newfound positions of authority for African–Americans, won through the struggle and sacrifice of the people during the civil rights movement, cannot be used to benefit the people if "John Lewis is isolated from Louis Farrakhan, who is isolated from Julian Bond, who is isolated from etc... etc." In order to take advantage of the gains of the civil rights movement, "We must have unity," Ture said.

Ture praised Martin Luther King, Jr. as having best exemplified this spirit of unity, which he said was the most important manifestation of the principle of non-violence. Ture recalled that "The NAACP attacked King, the Nation of Islam attacked King, the Congress for Racial Equality attacked King, the Urban League attacked King, SNCC attacked King, but King never attacked any of us. We must mold this spirit of non-violence into a concrete reality of living unity for our people."

Some of those present, including the Jamaican poet Mutabaruka, implied that the principles of the civil rights movement had been abandoned by those who had become part of a "Black Bourgeoisie." Ture, however, insisted that the principles of freedom and justice fought for by SNCC would live on, "even if every brother and sister who worked for SNCC betrays those principles."

"This room," Ture said, "is a very powerful room. You have individuals in this room who, once their individual powers are put together and added, will surpass the sum of their individual values tremendously."

"There were two kinds of power in that room," according to Thelwell. "When I looked at the faces of all these SNCC people, it occurred to me that there was probably more courage in that room than in any other structure in the United States that night," Thelwell said. "But then there were also political figures there who represent a different kind of political power, such as it is. You have Bobby Rush, who was the deputy leader of the Black Panthers in Chicago, and is now a congressman. There was Eleanor Holmes Norton, who is the congressional representative of the District of Columbia, and she was a SNCC activist in Greenwood. There was John Lewis, who was chairman of the organization for a long time. There were various ambassadors and diplomats and Minister Farrakhan. And of course the mayor, Marion Barry, who was also a former leader of SNCC."

One can only add that there appears to have been a third form of power in that room, the power of the love, respect and affection displayed that night for Kwame Ture. It was the power of an extraordinary group of people giving living meaning to the idea that, "Once you sacrifice for the people, the people will always sacrifice for you."

UM prof. aids friend with book

Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts professor Michael Thelwell is currently assisting Kwame Ture in writing his memoirs, which are to be published by Scribners. Thelwell has been emphatic in pointing out, however, that his function is organizational and editorial. "A lot of people seem to have the impression that I'm ghost-writing Kwame's book, or that I'm helping Kwame write this book, but that's not true. My role is much more modest than that. The man or woman who will put words into Kwame Ture's mouth or ideas in his head is not yet born."

"I'm like the arranger and he's the composer," Thelwell said. "He gives the information to me, and I put it in the right place, like an arranger working on a composition written by somebody else. I'm giving it structure, which is an editorial function. The book is Kwame's, the life is Kwame's and the story is extraordinary."

Thelwell and Ture first met as students at Howard University in the early 1960s and were colleagues in the Student Non-Violent Coordinating Committee (SNCC) during the Civil Rights Movement. The idea for the Ture memoirs came in the aftermath of a tribute to and lecture by Kwame Ture which was organized by Professor Thelwell and held at the University of Massachusetts Campus Center auditorium last year.

The book is "coming along in bits and starts," Thelwell said, "because Ture doesn't stay still and place. We have to work in long distance in many cases. But what I'm doing is more difficult than simply writing a book. If that was all, I'd simply sit down and write it. I'm not doing that. I'm working with Ture's thoughts, Ture's language, Ture's words, and I'm trying to give them form. He talks, free associates and dictates into tapes. It's very coherent, sharp and clear, and very defiant and uncompromising. It speaks the truth about the state of black people in the world and the truth about this country."

Thelwell says that he finds the project both fascinating and enjoyable. "I thought I knew Kwame very well since we've been in touch over all these years, but his life is far more exciting, surprising and consequential than anything I had imagined. What will emerge from it, even if I'm incompetent, will be one of the more surprising, fascinating and significant books published on the Black Movement in our time. I consider myself extremely fortunate to have even this minor role in this document because it really is, I think, one of the essential books about American society, African peoples in the Diaspora, and about a tradition and a life of principled, focused struggle. There aren't many books like that."

The Ture memoirs also promises to be invaluable by documenting Ture's life after he left the United States in the early 1970s, about which very little else has been written. Thelwell says that it's at the moment when he is working on those sections that he becomes most excited by the project.

Material about Ture's travels through countries such as Cuba, Libya and Vietnam and the role and activities of his party, the All-African People's Revolutionary Party, in various nations is mostly new even to Thelwell, an old friend and colleague of Ture's.

"Much of this has a ring of inevitability about it," Thelwell said. "Of course that had to happen, of course it had to be like that... except you couldn't possibly have imagined it until he tells you. Even I am amazed, I who thought I knew Ture so well. There will be a lot of new material about his relationship with Kwame Nkrumah, Sekou Toure, and Africa at the time of the most intense struggle for national liberation."

"When Ture describes graphic experiences and events such as the Portuguese invasion of Guinea, being jailed in Ghana, being jailed in Guinea after Sekou Toure died, conversations with Ho Chi Minh about the time he spent in Harlem and his attitude toward the African–American struggle, they have a quality of inevitability and authenticity that really get me excited. These are things that nobody knows about, but this is information that this country needs to have."

In praise of Kwame Ture

Note from the editor: At the "Friends of Kwame Ture Testimonial Dinner," on April 8, in Washington D.C., many in attendance paid tribute to Kwame Ture. The following are two of the more noteworthy testimonials.

Cleve Sellers
Professor of African American studies, University of South Carolina

I came to Howard University from a small town in South Carolina, looking to see all of the civil rights activists. When I got there I was able to find a few solid, sturdy individuals, and one of them was a lanky, young, arrogant intellectual from New York by the name of Stokley Carmichael. Coming from down south to up north there was a certain amount of culture shock. In any event, I wanted to be a part of the movement. And I learned that Stokely had been arrested in Mississippi and sent to Parchment Penitentiary. I thought that maybe he should be the person that I should come to know.

Over time the friendship and the bond grew, and I was able to learn about a very caring, compassionate and deeply committed young man with an affectionate personality. He would go on to become an icon, certainly for human rights, black empowerment, pan-Africanism, and socialism.

I remember the time we went to Mississippi in the summer of 1964, and when we got to Oxford we found that our three comrades had gone missing in Philadelphia, Mississippi. There was a group of eight of us that were asked to go to Philadelphia and see if we could find our missing comrades. During the day we stayed in a barn, and at night we would go out and search ravines, old garages, wells, all kinds of places where either the bodies of our comrades might have been stashed or hostages might have been held.

During that time we had an opportunity to talk. We talked about a lot of things but we never talked about fear. We never talked out the kinds of sacrifices that we were making. I remember Stokley very well talking at this time about a deeper commitment that we all had to make to the struggle. Stokley has made that commitment. And our responsibility is to go forward and teach our children about the legacies of those individuals who have given sacrifice.

John Lewis
US Representative (D-Georgia)

My friend, my colleague, my brother, Mr. Chairman, I salute you tonight because of your raw courage, and your great strength. I had the great blessing of serving as Chair of SNCC from June 1963 to May 1966, during the time of the March On Washington, Mississippi Freedom Summer and the March from Selma to Montgomery. James Forman used to call us "a circle of trust, a band of brothers and sisters."

Stokley, you are a warrior, because you dared to stand up and speak truth to power. Tonight I come to say thank you Brother Stokley. As a participant in the movement, I spent time with you in Atlanta, in Mississippi, in Alabama, in Maryland. I cannot forget the time we shared a room together in Greenwood back in 1964.

Stokely, you have been guided by what I like to call the spirit of history. You allowed the spirit of history to use you, to track you down. And you understood the old African proverb, "if you care, move your feet." You've been moving more than just your feet, you move your mind, your skills, your great talents as an organizer and a teacher. We're better people, we are a better nation, because of you. It's my belief that when historians pick up their pens and write about this period, they will have to say that Kwame Ture made a difference. You stood up and spoke out for those who had been left out and left behind.

You are a good man. You are a good leader. You have the ability and the capacity to put yourself in the way. And you are still in the way. Stay in the way. Continue to agitate for what is right, what is fair and what is just. You forgot about your own circumstances and got involved in the circumstances of others. Thank you my brother. Thank you my friend. Thank you Mr. Chairman. Thank you.

"The Black Affairs logo should go... on every page in the Collegian."

In response to the editorial "The Black Affairs logo should go," regarding the use of the clenched fist "prominently displayed" on the Black Affairs page, let me first reiterate the author's own words so that he may, perhaps, understand clearly what they mean. "The Black Affairs Page is meant to address issues which are important to people of color." That means US! In the tradition of the Black Press, what appears on the black affairs page centers around what WE feel is appropriate, what we choose to put on those pages and what is important to US!

That "juvenile bit of graphic design," as you called our black fist, is the Black Power salute which became a world- wide symbol of resistance to the racist, oppressive environment in which people of color struggle incessantly to exist. At the 1968 Olympic games, brothers of color Tommy Smith and John Carlos won silver and gold medals in the name of the United States, a country which systematically oppresses people of color. Standing before the world as two of its best, the two raised their fists in protest of that oppression, sending a clear, powerful message of resistance to everyone watching.

That act, that statement was seen and felt worldwide. It sparked renewed energy and support for the Black Power movement. Those who took offense to it were those guilty of perpetuating racism and oppression and afraid of what those two black men, the cream of the world crop, were silently shouting. Don't be afraid, you're no racist. In fact, as you wrote, some of your closest "friends, colleagues and acquaintances" are black. I'm sure that upon reading your editorial, at least one of them made sure to explain to you, in no uncertain terms, just what that black fist means. Perhaps they've even shown you a few of them up close.

If, as you put it, the "Black Affairs Page is ever to really serve the Black community," it must avoid getting bogged down in diluting its messages to make them more palatable to those for whom they are not intended.

All you need to understand about the Black Affairs Page is this: until it is safe four our young brothers to take a ride in whatever section of town they choose without fear of harassment, beatings, choke holds, arrests and death,

THE BLACK FIST STAYS!

Until the Susan Smiths of the world stop creating fictitious black kidnappers to take the blame for their own selfish, sick, twisted acts,

THE BLACK FIST STAYS!

Until the so–called opposition to affirmative action stops being simply a cover for the preservation of a racial and gender monopoly of jobs in this country,

THE BLACK FIST STAYS!

Until the police gangs put down their plungers (Abner Louima), batons (Rodney King), guns (Ben Schoolfield and thousands of other innocent blacks murdered by those paid to protect and serve), as long as racism, classism, oppression and brutality are allowed to pervade every aspect of society unimpeded, ravaging the lives of people of color.

THE BLACK FIST STAYS!

Until you DO something to end the oppression,

THE BLACK FIST STAYS! DEAL WITH IT!

Days for Days coheres sonically unlike previous albums

By Bradley Skaught

THE LOUD FAMILY
Days for Days
Alias

How do you follow mass destruction? Certainly this question must have been on the minds of anyone listening to The Loud Family's 1996 album, Interbabe Concern. Bursts of noise, corrosive guitars, and songs that twisted like barbed wire around naked, almost bitter vocals — Interbabe Concern was the sound songwriter/guitarist/vocalist Scott Miller (ex–Game Theory) falling apart. Even those who find it a masterpiece of modern pop have to admit it's a challenging album — well worth the many rewards, but challenging nonetheless. It's amazing, then, to see how much distance has been crossed — the journey that brings their latest, Days for Days.

If Interbabe Concern was the sound of things falling apart, then Days for Days is very much the sound of things holding together. Even the album's intro is a chorus of choppy, tremoloed vocals that slowly twist into focus before launching "Cortex the Killer," a song whose opening lines are, "I'm out in front of awful weather/trying to hold together/and it barely clings."

The organization of the album itself suggests that the remaining pieces of Interbabe Concern have become solid and new — that the fragmenting structures and chaotic explosions have given way to a struggle for order. The chaos has been replaced by a more rational, but no less elusive, series of questions that take the form of short transitional songs. Even numbered tracks are the titled songs, odd numbered tracks are the experimental songs — sound collages and scraps of the preceding song referred into a new song. Days for Days isn't necessarily an album of resolution, however (although track 17 seems to "answer" the questions posed in preceding experimental songs) — it's a record of picking up pieces and asking the nagging questions that arise from this "re–formulation." The first single, "Deee–pression," sounds more like a survivor's tale than a victim's plea with it's buoyant chorus and thundering power pop guitar. The narrator of "Way too Helpful," a gorgeous falsetto driven ballad, seem equally aware — no less emotionally involved, but imbued with a bittersweet air of experience and lessons learned. Perhaps Miller is trying to teach us something — perhaps the fragments of Interbabe Concern cohere into more than just questions.

Here, the members of The Loud Family pose silently.

Certainly Days for Days coheres sonically in a way that previous albums haven't. It is, in fact, the most like a real band The Loud Family (or even Game Theory for that matter) has ever sounded on record. Now thoroughly out from under Mitch Easter's shadow, Miller's homemade production from Interbabe Concern has given way to an astonishingly organic, "live" sound that really emphasizes the strengths and dynamics of the ensemble.

It helps, too, that the ensemble is fully responsive and sensitive to the wiry twists of Miller's songs. New keyboardist Allison Faith Levy keeps the lines simple and unassuming — truly more of an accompanying, textural force than a melodic element. She's particularly stunning on "Good, There are No Lions in the Street," a sweeping ballad that stirs and boils under the subtle modulations of her single keyboard — a beautifully resourceful and moving performance. She also uses an acoustic piano more than once which is a nice change from the distracting synthesizers that occasionally plagued earlier albums.

The return of Game Theory drummer Gil Ray, always Miller's most responsive and understanding drummer, has an equally profound impact on the band. The drumming throughout is tasteful and intelligent, bringing a kind of fluid, unifying propulsion to Miller's often dizzying song structures. It helps, too, that album is so well recorded — a real sense of space and interaction pervades, allowing the band to keep the arrangements stripped down without sounding hollow.

It isn't just the instrumental arrangements that are stripped down, as Days for Days sees Miller at his most accessible and immediate in Miller's catalog — the closest he's ever come to playing it straight. In some ways Miller has always been very much in the classic pop lineage that runs from The Beatles to Big Star and on through acts like The dB's and The Go–Betweens, but Miller is simply willing to push the envelope a lot further than most pop writers.

He explores dimensions of the craft that are a long way from the foundation with tricky rhythms, unusual chord progressions, and a complete avoidance of cliche without ever losing sight of the melodic soul — he may, in fact, be the only truly overtly "pop" in nature then he has in years. Even the lyrics have a more conversational, unassuming quality.

Where Interbabe Concern was often a waterfall of words, Days for Days seems more strict — more concise. Songs like "Businessmen Are Okay" and "Why We Don't Live in Mauritania" present a fresh, even lightly humorous, language that belies the more challenging questions underneath. It's almost as though Miller is facing issues he can deal with straight and he's communicating them without the tumbling, extended phrasing of Interbabe Concern. Those looking for the Scott Miller lyrical wizardry won't be disappointed, however — there's plenty here to decipher and Miller continues to solidify his reputation as one of rock's most imaginative songwriters.

In fact, the album closer, "Sister Sleep", may very well stand as one of his greatest triumphs. In some ways it recalls Arthur–era Kinks with its varying tempos, multiple parts, and razor sharp dynamic pacing. It's a breathtaking portrait of the individual surrendering to the whole — of identity surrendered echoing the surrender of life to death. "Will sister sleep not kiss us on the mouth?" he asks, "It's all we ever want from her." No other songwriter around could write such a moving and graceful song — Miller's craft is exemplary and his ear for hook and phrase nearly infallible. Put simply, this is what the craft of songwriting is all about.

Days for Days may not carry the same kind of introspective emotional weight that Interbabe Concern does, but the immediacy and vital forward looking spirit makes it equally affecting and rewarding. It's almost a starting over of sorts — a revitalized sound full of promise and lyrics that suggest some real healing and some real yearning. Another amazing album that begs its listeners to ask why The Loud Family remains so obscure. They are simply the most imaginative and original pop band on the planet — a real visionary force in a genre that threatens to sink from the weight of its own backward looking baggage. Do yourself a favor, discover Scott Miller and find the living, breathing imagination of pop alive and well. For once you'll listen to a record and actually feel like you got somewhere worth going to. A+

Not enough sex in the daytime

Last week I came across a disturbing little article concerning sex on daytime and recent attempts to curb it which would make it what, non-existent. Do these concerned parties, whoever they may be (parent's coalition, blah, blah), even watch soaps? Thanks to them, daytime's got the bite of an after school special and yet they continue to whine. Daytime has been nothing but gracious in their demands and has often complied with them (still are) but it's time for the genre to draw a line in the sand. Anyone who watches daytime religiously, like moi, knows that the problem isn't the fact that there's too much sex on daytime, it's that there isn't nearly enough.

I have two things I'd like to say, the first being that people are too uptight about sex, whether it's explicit or implied (as it often is in daytime). Second, if this is a cry from parents who are concerned about their children being improperly influenced, the solution is as easy as the click of a switch. Just don't let them watch it, it's as easy as that. Don't give me this crap about not being able to regulate what your kids watch. Sorry darlings, but as my mother often points out "it comes with the job description."

There's no need for the rest of us (or our soaps, for that matter) to suffer because you refuse to shoulder some of the responsibility. Don't fret my fellow soap fans, there's still plenty of spice left in daytime (à la Gillian and Ryan's cabin fever on "All My Children"). I just wanted to make you aware that there's a possible threat on the horizon ("I got your back"). Besides, can you ever get enough shots of a scantily clad Sonny and Brenda rolling around on the beaches of Puerto Rico... my, it's getting hot in here! Well, it's almost the end of the semester and I've spent the better half of it running at the mouth about my opinions, thoughts, etc. This week I thought I'd try something a little different and give other fans a chance to speak their mind (all of which are out to steal my job). Here's what they had to say about their fave soap:

Caroline had this to say about "Guiding Light." If you didn't see "Guiding Light" last week, you missed out because it was the bomb. What's up with the real Reva calling everyone from her little hospital bed in the Bermuda Triangle (or wherever the hell she is) and getting dissed by everyone. The scene when Reva called the house and "Cloney" answered the phone was a riot. Why doesn't Gaste tell Hart what's going on with Josh and Reva? I'm happy that dopey Rob was given the boot. The guy couldn't act his way out of a paper bag (ouch). Abby getting beaten and harassed in prison isn't exactly my idea of a good time. What's up with Harley and Phillip? I saw that hot kiss between Phillip and Beth... pretty hot but I'm still pulling for a Harley-Phillip reconciliation. Where's Jenna and their son, "Coop, Cooper?" I guess they went back to England. Maybe that's why Buzz has been so uptight lately. (Well, at least the actor who plays Rob is a hottie which means he's not a complete loss. Daytime's pretty demanding too. Can't wait to see Reva and Reva 2 lock horns later this week).

Cathy had this to say about "As the World Turns." One of the most underrated soaps. The show has an incredible cast but, in recent years, has ignored much of its rich family history. Some of the storyline's have dragged on a bit too but overall, "ATWT" is thoroughly entertaining, well-written and superbly directed.

(The show is without a doubt and as I have said before, one of daytime's best kept secrets. Great show).

Jeremy had this to say about "Days of Our Lives." The most entertaining soap on television today. It has some truly interesting characters and the show is always interesting. Unfortunately, "Days" tends to focus on only one storyline at a time while putting others on the back burner. It would be better to have numerous story lines going on at once. Also, this chat they have with themselves needs to go. "Days" needs to give it's audience a little credit. Otherwise, "Days" is must–see–tv.

(There's a reason "Days" is my number two soap and as much as I hate to admit it , Jeremy's right, with the exception of it being described as " always interesting." That's a bit of a stretch).

Gina had this to say about "Port Charles." The newest soap on the block has a lot going against it. Any new soap has a rough time and "PC" has, unfortunately, been plagued with the cursed 12:30 p.m. time slot. At first, I didn't really care for it that much but I've come around since then. I'm not saying it's the best soap on television but, lately, I've been getting into it. The show revolves around the interns at "GH" but the new story is the "who killed Dr. Benett?" mystery, where anything can and most likely will happen. Those of you who loved the "Loving" murder mystery oh so long ago will love this one. Don't be fooled though, it's no knock-off. If you have some time to kill, check it out. Anything affiliated with "General Hospital" deserves a chance.

(Amen to that, Gina. "PC" has really hit its stride in recent months and has one hell of a murder mystery in this hoopla. Nothing gets my adrenaline pumping like a juicy who-dunnit. The show's got a cute cast too).

In a bit of news... how does the old saying go, "be careful of what you wish for."

Rumor has it, Senait Ashenafi (Keesha) has been given her walking papers from "GH." I feel awful for the actress but her character has always been a bit of a bore, not to mention sanctimonious, annoying, need I go on. Oh well, there goes Al's only friend in town. It's only a rumor though so don't crack open the champagne just yet.

Sink or Swim
Sink

• It has nothing to do with the soaps directly but it's definitely becoming an issue with those of us who watch soaps in the comfort of the Blue Wall. I'm referring to that awful blender contraption which they have so kindly placed five feet away from the television set. The thing is so loud I can't even hear the television and when the volume is set, we have absolutely no recourse. I'm not calling for an end to smoothies here, just please don't set the volume on the television.

• Robin on "General Hospital"... ugh, the woman has been infuriating as of late, constantly lecturing people on morality and throwing around her two cents as to what's best for baby Michael. Bob Guza needs to start doing some damage control before her character is completely ruined (and I used to be such a Robin fan)

Swim:

• "Another World." After watching an entire week's worth of the show I can't stop gushing about just how good it is. Lila is, as always, endlessly fascinating; Cindy and Grant are turning out to be one of daytime's hottest and zaniest couples and the list goes on and on.

Grateful Dead honored by local fans

By Jason Eiseman
Collegian Staff

Grateful Dead Day was held in Northampton on Friday, it included a concert by a Grateful Dead cover band, and the signing of a new reference book about The Grateful Dead compiled by a local man and several University of Massachusetts students.

"This will be a gathering of the clan," said John Dwork, of Northampton, author and editor of The Deadhead's Taping Compendium Volume 1, a 600 page book describing every concert The Grateful Dead ever played from 1959–1974. It was published by Holt Books.

Dwork was signing the book at Beyond Words Book Shop. A Pioneer Valley, Grateful Dead tribute band, The Lobsters From Mars played in the book shop's cafe during the signing.

At 8 p.m. The Zen Tricksters, a Grateful Dead Tribute band played a three–set concert at the Northampton Center for the Arts. The concert was one set acoustic, and two electric. There was imagery provided by The Speed of Light Show.

The compendium was co–authored by Michael Getz, who communicated with Dwork through the Internet. Dwork said there were 50 other Grateful Dead scholars who collaborated on the book, which was entirely coordinated through the Internet.

"This is the manifestation of what serious Grateful Dead music scholars do," Dwork said. "We decided to manifest this into a project we could share."

Dwork said the first volume took three years to complete. Dwork and fellow scholars found every Grateful Dead tape recorded during the period, and put them into a database with every song which was ever recorded.

They studied the different technologies which are associated with concert taping. They interviewed a lot of the original recorders of these tapes.

All in all, Dwork said they found over 10,000 hours of recorded music.

Dwork praised the work of UMass student Adam MacConnell. He said MacConnell was one of the most important fact checkers for the book.

Dwork said compiling this book is part of his passion for the music of The Grateful Dead.

"I learned in college from a music teacher that the best way to go at something is to experience it from many different angles," Dwork said. "The best way to experience a passion is through education."

Dwork said the book also features 70 never–before–seen photos of the Grateful Dead. There is also an interview with Grateful Dead tape archivist Dick Latvala.

"If you love the music of the Grateful Dead you have to have a copy of this book," Dwork said.

Dwork was the founder of the Grateful Dead Historical Society at Hampshire College. He is also the publisher of Dupree's Diamond News, a rock and roll magazine.

Women's crew downs Ivy League competition

By Aaron M. Soykin
Collegian Staff

After plowing through the Atlantic 10 competition two weekends ago, the members of Massachusetts women's crew team flexed their muscles in the Ivy League on Saturday by handily defeating highly–touted Dartmouth and Cornell.

Prior to their meeting with the Minutewomen, the Big Green was ranked third in the Northeast, but after a six– second drubbing in the varsity eight boat race, UMass coach Jim Dietz feels his squad should leapfrog Dartmouth in the polls.

"Dartmouth was ranked third before this weekend, but we should at least move up into their spot in the polls," he said, hinting that the commanding Minutewomen victory may help earn a team bid for the NCAA Championships on May 30. "We're still hoping for the team bid to the NCAA's. This win should help us out," Dietz said.

Despite an overall team performance which Dietz classified as "solid," the fourth year coach was not entirely elated with the results, after the Big Green narrowly defeated the junior varsity crew.

"The J.V. racing was the most exciting all weekend. All the races were within one second. In my mind, races that close should be called a dead heat because they're just too close to call," Dietz said. "I think they [the J.V. athletes] felt they should have won the race."

In addition to the impressive rowing by his varsity team, Dietz was amazed by the intensity of his freshmen crew, whom he characterizes as having an extremely bright future.

"The freshmen rowed with tremendous tenacity," he said. "They're headed for a great future at UMass because they're very exciting and extremely driven."

As the regular–season finale for UMass, Saturday's impressive showing boosted both the confidence and reputation for the Minutewomen, who will enjoy almost an entire month of preparation as they anticipate their inclusion in the NCAA Championships.

"I think the month of practice is going to make us a lot faster," Dietz said, adding that a break in action may be the perfect tonic for his team. "Conditions had been pretty severe along the Connecticut River, so it's been tough for us... I'm not too worried about the break from competition. Our varsity women are very driven, and we're going to get a lot of work done."

In contrast to powerhouse crews of the south, the Minutewomen have not had the luxury of warm weather to get an early jump on their season. Although often a drawback during the regular season, Dietz feels it may be an advantage come tournament time, as he expects his rowers to surprise the competition with their speed.

"The past couple of weeks, we've shown some of the speed we have, and with a month of practice, we should be at our fastest by the time the NCAA's come," he said. "Some of the other crews may have already been at their fastest when we raced them during the regular season."

IRAs for PEOPLE in EDUCATION and RESEARCH

THEY HAD HELP WRITING THE NEW TAX LAWS. SHOULDN'T YOU HAVE HELP FIGURING THEM OUT?

It took 535 congresspeople—and countless lawyers, economists, and advisors—to turn out the new tax laws. Fortunately, you can turn to one expert source for answers on the options and opportunities they provide.

Ask TIAA-CREF about the new Roth IRA and other ways to save.

TIAA-CREF IRAs can make it easier than ever to save for retirement and other goals as well. We'll explain the new Roth, Classic, and Education IRAs, discuss whether consolidating your existing IRA savings makes sense, and help you design an effective tax-savings strategy.

What's more, new eligibility rules may now make it possible for you or your spouse to take greater advantage of TIAA-CREF for more of your long-term planning needs.

We wrote the book on retirement planning.

After all, these aren't the first "new" tax laws we've seen in our 80 years of service to education, research, and related fields. Nor is it the first time we've helped people like you make the most of them.

Sox league-leader in wins

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

BOSTON — The Boston Red Sox committed two errors in the first inning and walked the bases loaded in the last. And they still beat the best hitting team in the American League.

The Red Sox again showed their ability to overcome adversity in Sunday's 2-1 victory over the Texas Rangers, the 14th time they've come from behind in their 20 wins. Going into yesterday's off day, they shared the major-league lead for victories.

"I really don't even know our record," said Mo Vaughn, who is batting .361 with nine homers. "All I know if that we're winning. We definitely played very well during the month of April and haven't started out too badly in the month of May."

The Red Sox were just 3-5 on their season-opening West Coast trip but are 17-4 since then. Their surprising 20-9 record is built on pitching, hitting and fielding.

Going into the one-day break, three of their players led the AL — Pedro Martinez in strikeouts, Tom Gordon in saves and Nomar Garciaparra in triples. Vaughn was fourth in batting average and tied for third in homers.

The team is second in the AL in homers and batting average, its 4.20 ERA ranks third and the outfield defense, with the addition of Darren Lewis and Damon Buford, has been outstanding.

With the score 1-1 and runners at first and second in the fourth inning Sunday, Buford leaped against the centerfield wall and robbed Luis Alicea of an extra-base hit and the Rangers of two runs.

"I feel if I get my glove on a ball I should catch it," Buford said.

The pitching also was strong. The Rangers only run was unearned in the first as Martinez allowed just five singles in seven innings. But Gordon walked three batters in the ninth before ending the game by getting Rusty Greer to ground out.

Gordon, confident like most players on the successful team, stayed calm throughout the ordeal.

"I didn't get rattled," he said. "I knew my stuff was good. I was just missing down" in the strike zone.

The challenge gets easier Tuesday when Minnesota, with a 12-18 record, opens a two-game series that ends the Red Sox' seven-game homestand, although the Twins pitching has been strong. Boston's next eight games are on the road, at Kansas City, Texas and Minnesota.

Texas leads the AL West with a 19-10 record and went into Sunday's game with four of the AL's top 10 hitters. The Red Sox expect to face challenges from top teams all season.

Despite their start, they still trail the New York Yankees by 1 1/2 games in the AL East. They play each other seven times late in May. "This division is very tough," Vaughn said. "We kind of like that."

With starters Martinez and Bret Saberhagen both unbeaten and solid relief pitching, the Red Sox have shown they can handle top hitters. And before making four errors Sunday — two by shortstop Garciaparra — they had just six in their previous 19 games. Fortunately for the Red Sox, they have enough weapons to make up for occasional flubs.

"I'm always aggressive," Martinez said, "especially in those moments when Nomar and those guys make the error. I try to pick them up and, if I can go for a strikeout, I'll go for it because I want them to feel OK."

Yankees's best start since pennant-winning '77 season

By Doug Tucker
Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Look out, Texas! Here come the New York Yankees, winners of 19 of 21 and an eclectic collection of experience and youth constructed from farm teams and free agency, Japan and the junk heap.

They are off to a major league-leading 20-6 record — the Yankees' best start in 40 years.

After routing Kansas City 10-1 on Sunday, New York moved into exclusive territory — no Yankees team had captured 19 of 21 since the pennant-winning club of 1977.

"They're very talented and they're playing very well," Kansas City manager Tony Muser said. "They're scoring runs, they're pitching well and their bullpen is good. It's a very fine team." Former Cy Young winner David Cone will start against the Rangers on Tuesday, trying to keep alive what he admits has been an "incredible run."

"We have speed, offensively and defensively. We've been making things happen," Cone said. "It's been somebody different every night."

Unlike many good Yankees teams of the past, this one is fast. It leads the majors with 44 stolen bases.

They're also strong. In the last five games, they've hit 11 home runs, most impressively Darryl Strawberry's 435-foot grand slam on Saturday against the Royals.

Yes, that Darryl Strawberry. Supposedly washed up after a host of problems, including a federal conviction on tax charges and a trip to the Betty Ford clinic, the eight-time All-Star and his bulging biceps are back. Now a mature 36, he leads the Yankees with seven home runs and has 18 RBIs and a .333 average.

"He's been a perfect fit and a model citizen," said Cone. While sweeping three from the Royals over the weekend, the Yankees scored 12 runs in one game and 10 in the other. On the one night the Royals managed to quiet the Yankees' bats, however, the Yankees had Hideki Irabu on the mound and won 2-1.

In his longest stint yet as a Yankee, the Japanese right-hander went 7 1-3 innings, combined with two relievers on a two-hitter and said he's finally getting the hang of American baseball.

In three starts, the rapidly improving Irabu has allowed just three earned runs.

"His fastball has been more than dominating," teammate Scott Brosius said. "And they've finally got it through to him that his split-finger does not have to be for strikes. When he came over here, he'd throw a split-finger in the dirt and say he was sorry. Heck, that's where it should be."

The Yankees are also opportunistic and smart. They've scored 20 unearned runs while giving up just six.

"To be honest, this team is very unique in a lot of ways," said second baseman Chuck Knoblauch, acquired from Minnesota to provide the lead-off spark that was missing. "When we were on an eight-game streak earlier in the year, nobody was getting too happy or out of control. We lost that ninth game, and then everybody came to the park the next day and went right back to work. There was such a good, positive attitude in the clubhouse.

"This team has a lot of experience. People know not to get too carried away with anything."

If the Yankees voted on an MVP right now, it would probably be first baseman Tino Martinez.

"This is the first time I've ever been on a team like this," he said. "It just seems like everybody who comes up in a key situation gets the job done."

Capitals grow into new role sitting atop the Eastern Conference

By Joseph White
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Washington Capitals have a new label: favorites.

Having rid themselves of an emotional burden by not blowing a 3-1 series lead against the Boston Bruins, the former first-round heartbreakers unexpectedly find themselves the top seed remaining in the Eastern Conference.

Suddenly, because New Jersey, Pittsburgh and Philadelphia were all upset in the first round, the Capitals have the home ice all the way to the Stanley Cup finals, starting with Thursday night's Game 1 against Ottawa in the conference semifinals. They earned the home advantage by winning the last four games of the regular season, clinching fourth place on the final day.

"It's such a long season," defenseman Mark Tinordi said. "You figure no one win or loss is going to make your year. Any one win would have made our year because it would give us home-ice advantage."

The fans, and no doubt the players, will be waiting to see how coach Ron Wilson handles the team's new role. For the last week or so, when confronted with the Capitals' infamous history of losing 3-1 series leads, he stared the demon in the face until it flinched. The Capitals had blown three series when they were leading three games to one.

"Look how many coaches tried to ignore it," Wilson said after Sunday's clinching, 3-2 overtime victory in Game 6 at Boston.

"New Jersey lost. Philly's out. Pittsburgh (is out)," Bruins goalie Byron Dafoe said. "If we had won this series, I thought we had a chance to go to the finals.

Burns improves B's

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

BOSTON — The Bruins of 1997-98 may not compare with some of the other teams Pat Burns has coached. But, Burns may eventually realize, the job he did in Boston is just as impressive.

Taking over a team that had the worst record in the NHL last season, Burns brought the Bruins back to the playoffs after a one-year hiatus and appears to have them back on track for a success.

"The Bruins are a team of the future," Washington coach Ron Wilson said Sunday after his Capitals eliminated Boston from the playoffs with a 3-2 victory in Game 6 — the third overtime game of the series.

The improvement from 61 points (26-47-9) last season to 91 (39-30-13) this year is the biggest in Bruins history (not counting the 1994 lockout). And it isn't the first time Burns has successfully revived an "Original Six" team.

He was named head coach of the Canadiens in 1988, a team that had 103 points (45-22-13) the year before but lost in the divisional finals. In his first year, Montreal had 115 points — second-best in the league — riding Bob Gainey and Larry Robinson to the Stanley Cup finals and earning Burns coach of the year honors. In 1992-93, Burns was named the head coach of a Toronto franchise that hadn't been above .500 in 13 years. He led them to consecutive appearances in the conference finals, going from 67 points in 1991-92 to 99 in his first year — the biggest single-season turnaround in team history — and Burns was named coach of the year for the second time.

"I'm not going to start comparing these guys to those teams," Burns said Sunday.

But someday he might look back on his roster and pick out names like Joe Thornton, Jason Allison, Sergei Samsonov and Ray Bourque and say the same thing.

"Pat brought a lot of players together and brought the peak-potential out of a lot of guys," said Byron Dafoe, who became the Bruins starting goaltender and posted a 2.24 goals against average in the regular season that dropped to 2.14 in the playoffs. "Jason Allison is a great example of that, and I had a career year. He (Burns) gave the young guys a chance to show what they could do," Dafoe said. "All I am saying is: Look out for next year."

Allison was acquired last year in a midseason deal with Washington along with Anson Carter and Jim Carey. Adam Oates, Rick Tocchet and Bill Ranford — three older players who made more money and had criticized Bruins management — were sent to the Capitals. Under Burns' tutelage, Allison emerged as a bona fide star, leading the Bruins in scoring with 33 goals and 50 assists. Carey never recovered the form that had earned him the Vezina Trophy as the league's top goaltender, but Carter's 16 goals and 23 assists showed him to be a solid player, too.

"We'll be chomping at the bit waiting for September to come around this year," Carter said Sunday after scoring his first career playoff goal in the Game 6 loss.

Last year's finish earned coach Steve Kasper a pink slip and his team the first pick in the NHL draft. They took junior hockey star Thornton with another first-rounder obtained via trade, they took Samsonov from the IHL.

Thornton's development was slow, but Samsonov made a big splash, scoring 22 goals and tallying 25 assists to establish himself as the favorite for the Calder Trophy, which goes to the NHL's top rookie.

In all the tumult, one thing has remained constant with the Bruins for the last 19 years. Five-time Norris Trophy winner Ray Bourque was his usual steady self, tallying 48 points on 13 goals and 35 assists and playing about half his team's minutes.

He will be back next year, the last year of his contract, but he has not committed beyond then.

Horoscopes

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — Take care you don't say or do anything that could be taken the wrong way or held against you at a later date. Keep things clear and truthful.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You may be facing something of a challenge from someone who thinks you've recently done wrong, but it's all only circumstantial evidence, after all.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — Though you may not agree with a rival today, the fact is that you'll be compelled to support him or her in any way possible at this time.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You may be feeling as though someone is tightening the screws and trying to limit you in a way that could eventually inhibit creativity and profits.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You must be fully prepared today; you don't want to be caught unaware at any time—or for any reason. You must maintain control.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You may have to answer for something you didn't do today. Remain calm, and trust that those in the know will come to your defense.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — Avoid finger-pointing today. Do what you can to solve the problem without wasting time trying to fix blame. Be creative and productive.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — Once you see how much support you're getting from those around you, everything you're trying to accomplish will get that much easier.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You'll be asking a great many questions today–but you mustn't expect anyone to have immediate answers. This is stuff to think about.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You may not be able to state the facts today with absolute certainty, but you can help others put together a puzzle despite missing pieces.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — A social engagement is likely to provide more than enjoyment today. You're likely to depart knowing a great deal more than you did on arrival.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You may be asked by a friend or co-worker to cover up an indiscretion. Think twice before getting involved; don't risk your reputation.

L.A.-Seattle N.B.A. battle; best of the west

Oh, gimme the series. Hook me up with a little Seattle- Los Angeles action. From the first round to the finals, this series perhaps will bring the best basketball to the forefront. Sure, Seattle struggled in the first round against Minnesota, but the second round is a whole new ball game.

The Sonics/Lakers matchup is the most intriguing in years. Neither team has an answer for the other team's strength, therefore fate and the heat of the moment will determine who will move on.

Shaquille O'Neal understands his situation in L.A. In Orlando, he had Penny Nick Anderson, maybe Dennis Scott, but in the city, the talent is immeasurable, not even in today's game, but in what the future holds for this club. Diesel dreams of a Magic-like dynasty in L.A., and with the personnel the Lakers currently have, there's no doubt that an improvement in chemistry and overall team defense could pour more glamour into the Lake Show.

On the other hand, there's Seattle, who's steady as she goes. The obvious weakness that the Sonics will have to overcome is in the paint where O'Neal has at least fifty pounds on his closest competitor. He dominated the Sonics in the regular season, averaging 30 points and 12 rebounds, but the Sonics had the last laugh, taking three of four contests. Shaq is one story, but rebounding is another. Without a bonafide center, Vin Baker will need to have a remarkable series on the glass.

Seattle's defensive game is simple: double team Shaq and make the Lakers' erratic perimeter game beat you. Any way you look at the problem they're facing with O'Neal in the middle, there is no answer. Despite matching up nicely with the Diesel height-wise, Jim McIlvaine's defensive ability (and his contract) is hardly what the Sonics had hoped for upon his arrival a few years back. Until McIlvaine gets into foul trouble, which is guaranteed, he will body up against Shaq.

When Seattle coach George Karl is forced to bring Sam Perkins into the game, things get interesting. Shaq gives Seattle nightmares when he has the ball, but who does Shaq check when the Seattle frontcourt lists Perkins, Baker, and Detlef Schrempf? Perkins is always roaming around the arc on offense and there's no way Lakers coach Del Harris will send Shaq outside the key to defend him. Baker will post up O'Neal, but the Big Man would certainly get into foul trouble with Baker's versatility in the paint. It's a double- edged sword for both teams.

In the three losses this year to the Sonics, the Lakers shot 43-percent, compared to the 48-percent they shot in their only win. Not a big difference, but when it came to the 3-point shot, the Lakers shot 22-percent in the losses, 38- percent in the win. That puts all the more importance on the Lakers' numerous marksmen, for the most part, Eddie Jones, Nick Van Exel, Rick Fox, and Kobe Bryant. The Lakers must stay within the team game that they showed in the Portland series, and that they are ready for the big time.

Van Exel and Derek Fisher will try to control Gary Payton, but we could see a repeat of the first round at the point guard position, where Payton posted up Stephon Marbury, tiring him, eventually into a two for 10 performance in Saturday's deciding game.

Seattle's defense and three-point accuracy will be eventually be the deciding factor. Ball control will be very key for both teams, but the biggest key may be Key Arena. Seattle is 36-5 at home. Gimme Seattle in seven.

In the other Western Conference battle, Utah and San Antonio will try to mend the wounds of their last contest, where Karl Malone leveled David Robinson with a nice "inadvertent" elbow to the head. Utah's overall consistency will outdo the Twin Towers. If the Spurs have any chance, Jaren Jackson and Chuck Person need to come up huge. Utah in six.

I won't even elaborate on the Chicago–Charlotte series because it will probably be over before this paper even hits the presses (not really). Chicago's combination of offense and defense, along with the Michael Jordan factor, will easily propel the Bulls into the Eastern Conference Finals. Glen Rice will try to turn the series into a 1–on–1 with Jordan, but he has struggled to find his stroke as of late. I give the Hornets five games tops. Six of they're lucky, four if the Bulls play all–out.

Baseball wins two over the Bonnies; improve to 21-11

By Kathleen Rolls
Collegian Staff

This weekend was almost a washout for the Massachusetts baseball team as their weekend series with St. Bonaventure (21–21) was extended to Monday due to rainy conditions.

Saturday's doubleheader was postponed until Sunday and the third game was forced to yesterday. The Minutemen improved to 27–11, despite the loss yesterday. Finishing off their Atlantic 10 regular season contests, UMass ended with a 15–3 record, their best conference showing in school history. They have one more regular season game against Harvard on Wednesday at 3 p.m. at Earl E. Lorden Field.

Despite a fine effort by junior pitcher Ryan Cameron who allowed only one earned run while striking out six in seven innings, the Minutemen could not produce enough offense to offset the five errors they committed. The Bonnies took advantage, scoring four unearned runs. Freshman Craig Szado pitched the last two games, giving up one hit and walking two to accept the loss.

Shortstop Seth Kaplan and Aaron Braunstein contributed two hits apiece in the losing outing. Second baseman Muchie Dagliere hit 1–for–2 with two RBI but it was not enough.

On Sunday, UMass soundly defeated the Bonnies, 8–4. Junior hurler, Bill Cooke, gained his seventh–consecutive complete game win to improve to 8–1. The left–hander allowed four runs on six hits, striking out five.

The Minutemen were losing 4–3 in the fourth inning when centerfielder Doug Clark tied the game with an RBI single, driving in Bryan Mazzaferro. The junior also connected for a round–tripper in the second inning.

The two remained tied until the top of the ninth when Brian Samela tallied a lead–off homer. The catcher had three hits on the day. Leadoff hitter Shaun Skeffington topped off the effort with a two–run home run as the Bonnies failed to retaliate in the bottom of the inning. Dagliere, Skeffington, and Kaplan all had two hits apiece.

In the second half of the double dip, the Minutemen opened up with a 4–0 lead in the first inning. Clark repeated his performance, crushing a homer to left field. They contributed a pair of runs in the second as Skeffington and Dagliere earned the RBI. Kaplan repeated his performance with two hits as the offensive production was more spread out.

Scott Barnsby pitched one inning and Puleri earned the win to improve to 4–1. The senior allowed six hits and one earned run, including three Ks.

Massachusetts will head to Boyertown, Penn. as the reining A–10 East Champions this weekend for the A–10 tournament. As the No. 1 seed in the East UMass is set to face the No. 2 seed in the West, Virginia Tech, in the first round on Friday at 4 p.m. George Washington, the No. 1 seed in the West, will play the No. 2 seed in the East, Fordham, on Friday at 7:30.

Skeffington a quiet contributor to Minuteman diamond squad

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

In a lineup with arguably the best 3–4–5 combination in the nation in Muchie Dagliere, Doug Clark, and Pete Gautreau, it's understandable how leadoff hitter Shaun Skeffington can sometimes be overlooked.

The Fall River native, is very much responsible for many of the RBI that the big three drive in. With a .322 batting average and 40 runs scored to his credit, Skeffington has had a big part in the success of the Minutemen this season.

But to Skeffington, it's all just part of the job.

"As a leadoff hitter, my job is to get on base so that the three, four, and five hitters can knock me in," Skeffington said. "I'm just trying to make things happen out there and score some runs."

The sophomore designated hitter doesn't exactly fit the typical mold of a DH. Standing only 5–foot–5 and weighing only 140 pounds, Skeffington has found a spot in the UMass lineup through this route.

"Last year we gave him a shot, but he just wasn't developed enough yet," Massachusetts baseball coach Mike Stone said. "Shaun brings speed and quickness to our lineup, and also does a good job of hitting the ball."

Yes, Skeffington does bring both of those attributes to the table with him. He leads the team in doubles, a category which he is nationally ranked in, and is second on the team in stolen bases. In addition, Skeffington has two homers and 28 RBI on the year out of the leadoff spot.

"Yes and no [on being surprised about his success this year]. I'm working hard and I expect to get the best out of my ability," Skeffington said. "As a DH, I'm just doing what I have to do. Like I said before, as long as I get on base and score runs, then I'm doing my job."

As a freshman Skeffington saw action in 22 games, seven of which were starts. He hit .265 in 34 at–bats, but was a victim of the numbers game, as Clark, Gautreau, and Aaron Braunstein all had solid seasons.

Entering the season, it looked like Skeffington may be the odd man out once again, as the entire outfield was returning. The versatile Skeffington also could play second base, but Dagliere was back in that spot as well.

Instead, Skeffington has found a home as the DH, while also using this season to hone his defensive skills in preparation for the future.

And the hitting hasn't seemed to be a problem.

"Shaun is tough to pitch to, even in batting practice. He's a tough out at the plate," Stone said. "He's a hard–nosed kid and just a good kid to have on our team."

As far as the team, Skeffington has helped to lead the Minutemen to the A–10 Eastern Division crown, and is looking to help the Minutemen win the conference title this weekend when they head to Boyertown, Penn. for the A–10 tournament.

"We've been playing good ball, but I don't think that we've hit our peak yet," Skeffington said. "The next two weeks are going to be very important, and as long as we play together, then we should win."

As evidenced by both the individual and team success that Skeffington has been a part of in his first two years at UMass, it looks like Skeffington made the right decision by matriculating at his home state school.

"I liked the fact that UMass had a winning tradition and was recognized for its baseball team," Skeffington said. "Coach Stone was also a big part of my decision to come here. He talked to me about academics and also felt that I was a Div. I baseball player. He thought that I could help out the program, and I can say that I haven't played for a better coach."

And if this year is any indication of what Skeffington can do, it's a good thing for Stone and the rest of the Minutemen that he still has two more years to go in Amherst.

Women's lax gains berth to ECAC Tournament

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

As the minutes ticked by during the course of Monday morning, Francesca McClellan and the coaching staff of the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team waited patiently for the phone to ring. It was on this day that they would be called and notified whether or not they had been granted entry into the ECAC tournament.

Less than a week earlier, the Minutewomen lost their last regular season game to Boston University by a single goal, dropping the team's mark to 9–5 for the season. The irony in that game was that it was the first time in history that the Terriers came out on top in a matchup against UMass.

The loss seemed to ensure that the season would end on that day. It did not seem as though a 9–5 record would be sufficient to keep the season going, especially with only four spots open in the ECAC tournament and several teams having outstanding years. Cornell, Yale, Lafayette, Rutgers, and Penn State all seemed to overshadow the Massachusetts bid.

When the decision came through, though, the slots had been divided up as follows: Penn St. as the No. 1 seed, Rutgers as the No. 2 seed, Lafayette as the No. 3 seed, and UMass as the No. 4 seed. Based on the draw, the ECAC tourney will take place at Penn State beginning on Saturday. At noon, the Minutewomen will take on the Nittany Lions, and Lafayette and Rutgers will lock horns at around 2 p.m.

As the lowest seed, the odds are against UMass, but the opportunity is incredible none the less.

"I think we're lucky to have this opportunity," McClellan said. "Now it's about what we do with it. I feel like we've gotten a second chance."

The entry into the tournament marks the first time the program has taken part in post–season play since 1988, when the team took a 7–7–1 regular season record all the way to the championship game, one which they came up short.

As recently as 1996, the program had superficially seemed to be at the point of no return, as their 4–10 record marked the fifth time in six years of competition that the team fell into the double digits in the loss column. In the sixth year, the team went 0–8. For two years in the middle of that span, 1991–92, the University of Massachusetts disbanded the squad.

Even last season, when the team sported a 6–8 mark, a tournament spot seemed hopelessly out of reach for the near future. At least a year or two of fine–tuning and rebuilding still seemed to stand in the way of the ECAC's.

Fortunately, the process was accelerated, though, with the addition of the two standout freshmen goalies Tara Durkin and Jen Nardi, and the emergence of a strong, young defensive crew that consists of freshman Denise Brey, sophomores Jessica Passanese and Melissa Miele, and graduating captain Amy Leder.

The UMass participation into the ECAC tournament marks a turning point in the recent history of the program, and is the perfect finish to the dedicated career of Leder and her classmates, Jen Herker and Jen Bowen.

UM track second to VT at A–10's

By Kathleen Rolls
Collegian Staff

Unfortunately, for the rest of the Atlantic 10, Virginia Tech won the A–10 men's and women's outdoor track championships this past weekend in Blacksburg, Va. for the second year in a row.

While this may sound disappointing for UMass, it should be noted that it was mainly a two–sided affair, with the rest of the conference failing to keep within striking distance. For the women, Virginia Tech led the way with 252 points, UMass tapered off with 151, and La Salle scored 104.5. Rhode Island finished off with 103.75 and was followed by Dayton, Duquesne, St. Joseph's, Temple and Fordham.

On the men's side, the Hokies tallied 268 points to the Minutemen's 183. For the rest of the field, La Salle scored 84, and was followed by Rhode Island, St. Joseph's, Temple and Fordham.

The women were hoping to be the first team in the A–10 to capture the cross country, indoor track, and outdoor track titles. Shana Mitchell was the lone winner for Massachusetts earning first place honors in the hammer throw with a toss of 165 feet, 10 inches. The senior took second in the discus with a career–best throw of 147 feet, 11 inches, good for second place in the all–time UMass record books.

Though Mitchell may have been the only blue–ribbon winner, youth was served this weekend as freshman Alison Tostevin garnered the A–10 Rookie Performer of the Year. Tostevin placed third in the shot put and fifth in the discus.

Two other school records were set for the Minutewomen this weekend as well. Senior Anya Forrest shattered her own record in the 100–meter hurdles in a time of 14.01 seconds. The 4x400 meter relay squad also set a UMass record with Michelle Cooper, Andrea Comeau, Sllifa Kenku, and Shelanda Irish placing second with a time of 3:47.71.

Other notables include Irish's second–place finish in the 100–meter dash and Kenku taking second in the 400–meter intermediate hurdles. Nicole Way notched third–place in the 1,500 meters, and Sarah Hirach finished fourth in the 5,000 meters. The 4x100 quartet of Jamie Hedgecock, Forrest, Raquell Shelton, and Irish took second–place in a time of 47.32 seconds. In the 4x800m relay, Way, Melissa Henderson, Christy Martin, and Rebecca Donaghue grabbed third in a time of 9:21.06.

In the field events, Carole LaPlante placed fourth behind Tostevin in the shot put with a heave of 39 feet, three inches.

The Minutemen's performance was highlighted by senior Ryan Carrara's double–event winner in the 3,000–meter steeplechase and in the 5,000–meter run, recording a time of 15:51.81. On Saturday, Carrara paced his A–10 Championship time of 9:17.95 in the steeplechase. His teammate, freshman Brendan Sullivan, also took second place.

Junior Tom Toye set a new standard for UMass as he placed first in the 100–meter dash with a time of 10.70 seconds. The 4x400m relay team of Toye, Neil Concepcion, Dave Cahill, and senior Scott Price also set a new school record as they ran in a time of 3:10.99.

Ben Baraldi placed fourth in the 110–meter high hurdles in a time of 14.53. His teammate Mark Grogan grabbed sixth place. Concepion was fifth in the 400–meter intermediate hurdles, and his teammate Cahill followed right behind.

The Minutemen were well represented in the field events, as Sean McDole took top honors in the men's discus with a toss of 170 feet, nine inches. Sophomore Vic Moreney placed second, while Jan Stevens was sixth in the event. Stevens also placed second in the shot put as his best throw was 49 feet, 11 inches. UMass also had a fine showing by Andre Roach, as he leaped to third place in the triple jump.

Opposition organizing against peace accord

BELFAST, Northern Ireland (AP) — Politicians opposed to Northern Ireland's peace accord launched their "It's right to say no" campaign yesterday, a crusade rival Protestants warned could provoke random violence against Catholics.

The accord, a compromise agreement reached April 10 among eight parties and the British and Irish governments, must pass in referendums in both Northern Ireland and the Irish Republic before it can be implemented.

At the official kickoff of their "no" campaign, two pro-British Protestant parties made common cause with high-ranking defectors from the major Protestant party, the Ulster Unionists, which backs the agreement.

Although they predicted most of the north's sizable Catholic minority would vote for the accord, they maintained that the majority of Protestants would take their side.

Alabama gov. lambasts Supreme Court rulings

BIRMINGHAM, Ala. (AP) — Gov. Fob James told the U.S. Supreme Court he believes government officials should defy high court decisions they consider unconstitutional.

An attorney opposing the state in a school prayer case called the remarks a "treasonous" attack on the nation's legal system. James made the comments in written arguments filed Friday asking the Supreme Court to bypass an appeals court and overturn the decision of a judge who limited religious practices in DeKalb County schools.

On Monday, the governor asked the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to reverse U.S. District Judge Ira DeMent. The judge sided with a parent who claimed in a lawsuit that DeKalb schools unconstitutionally promoted Christianity in the classroom. State Attorney General Bill Pryor is challenging the ruling on behalf of the state. The governor filed a separate appeal. James, a Republican, touches on everything from baseball to the Bible in court papers written by his attorney-son, Forrest H. James III. The governor contends that Supreme Court justices have purposely ignored the Constitution to create new "rights," including the right to an abortion.

Graduation speakers announced

By Paul Hayes
Collegian Staff

Charlayne Hunter–Gault, a former national correspondent for the Public Broadcasting Service's "The NewsHour with Jim Lehrer," and former Maine Senator George J. Mitchell will be the two keynote speakers at the 128th University of Massachusetts undergraduate Commencement. The ceremony is at 10:30 a.m. on Sunday, May 24 in Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

Hunter–Gault left her job of 20 years as national correspondent for "The NewsHour with Jim Lehrer" in 1997 to move to South Africa, where she currently based as a reporter. She will be receiving an honorary doctor of humane letters.

In 1961, Hunter–Gault was one of the first two black students admitted to the all–white University of Georgia, where she received her degree in journalism in 1963.

She has held positions with The New Yorker, WRC–TV in Washington, D.C., and The New York Times, prior to joining the "MacNeil/Lehrer Report" in 1978 as its first woman anchor.

Hunter–Gault also anchored "Rights and Wrongs: Human Rights Television," a weekly half–hour news magazine on PBS, which included investigative reports, features and interviews examining human rights issues world wide.

Hunter–Gault has received many awards, including two national news and documentary Emmy awards, and the George Foster Peabody Award for Excellence in Broadcast Journalism for her work on the NewsHour's "Apartheid People" series on contemporary life in South Africa.

She was also named journalist of the year by the National Association of Black Journalists in 1986.

At the request of the governments of Great Britain and Ireland, Mitchell served as the chairman of the International Commission on Disarmament in Northern Ireland, and recently brokered a political settlement in the peace talks in Northern Ireland.

Charlayne Hunter–Gault

George J. Mitchell

Mitchell was appointed a U.S. Senator from Maine in 1980 to complete the unexpired term of Sen. Edmund S. Muskie, and was elected to a full term in the Senate in 1982 in a come–from–behind victory, and went on to serve as a senator for 14 years.

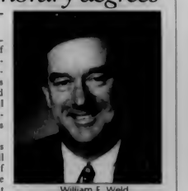
Voted "the most respected member" of the Senate for six consecutive years, Mitchell left the Senate in 1995 as majority leader, a position he had held since 1989. During his tenure, he led the successful 1990 reauthorization of the Clean Air Act, and was the author of the first national oil spill prevention and clean–up law.

Mitchell was also instrumental in the passage of the 1991 transportation bill to rebuild the nation's infrastructure and played a major role in enacting the nation's first child care bill.

He was a principal author of the low–income housing tax credit program and led the Senate to ratification of the North Atlantic Free Trade Agreement and the creation of the World Trade Organization.

Acting Governor Argeo Paul Cellucci will also attend the 128th Commencement ceremonies. He will deliver a greeting to the commonwealth.

About 4,000 undergraduates are candidates for bachelor's degrees this year. There will also be a separate Commencement for about 1,300 master's and doctoral degree candidates on Saturday, May 23 at the William D. Mullins Center at 10:30 a.m.



Also on Saturday, approximately 125 students will receive associates degrees from the Stockbridge School of Agriculture. That ceremony will be held in Bowker Auditorium at 2 p.m.

GEO puts child care money to work in flex–care center

By Jason Eiseman
Collegian Staff

The contract negotiations between the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) and the University of Massachusetts administration has been well documented.

Many people don't realize the impact the new contract will have on this campus. Many people know that GEO was awarded more money for child care services, but don't realize the money GEO won in their new contract will go directly to parents to pay for child care.

Graduates aren't the only parents who can take advantage of the child care money, undergraduates who need child care can access the money as well. Furthermore, all of the $100,000 in child care money will go directly to graduate and undergraduate parents for the 1997–98 school year.

How Will The Money Be Used?

According to Dickie Wallace, the family issues advocate for GEO, "the money will retroactively help people who've had to take out a student loan to pay for their child care."

"We'll probably be rolling over a decent chunk of it next year," he said.

The money will be disbursed in the form of vouchers and can be used at any recognized child care facility, public or private. There are applications which must be completed for students to receive voucher money. The applications can be picked up at the Graduate Student Senate in the Campus Center, and must be returned there as well.

Undergraduates can pick up applications at the Office of Commuter Services. Applications are due May 15.

Swiss Guard commander murdered in Vatican City

By Daniel J. Wakin
Associated Press

VATICAN CITY — Moving quickly yesterday to explain a bloody crime in their hallowed precincts, Vatican officials said a member of the pope's Swiss Guards was driven by bitterness over a reprimand and lack of recognition when he killed his commander, the commander's wife and then himself.

Pope John Paul II was "visibly sad" when told of the first multiple killings to take place inside Vatican City in centuries, and sent a message of condolence to the family of Col. Alois Estermann.

Instead of a swearing-in ceremony for 40 new guards, where Estermann was to be honored today, the Vatican will hold a funeral for him and his wife, Gladys Meza Romero, in St. Peter's Basilica. Estermann had been named commander of the guards just hours before his death.

Vatican officials said Alois Estermann and his wife were shot Monday night at their apartment, just off St. Peter's Square, by Cedrich Tornay, a 23-year-old noncommissioned officer who then turned his semiautomatic pistol on himself.

Tornay, a three-year member of the corps, had given a letter to be passed on to his family 90 minutes before the 9 p.m. killings, Vatican spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls said.

While he did not reveal the letter's contents, the spokesman said Tornay felt unappreciated and "very bitter" that he wasn't going to receive a decoration at the swearing-in ceremony. "He complained to his colleagues that he was not included in the list."

The guardsman also was outraged by a Feb. 12 letter of reprimand from Estermann, for staying out all night, the spokesman said. "It was a fit of madness in a person with very peculiar psychological characteristics," Navarro-Valls said. He said Tornay had a character that "let things build up to explode without logic," though he had shown no signs of psychological problems until now.

Recruits do not undergo psychological testing, but are chosen through a complex method that involves Swiss parishes and dioceses, Navarro-Valls said.

He ruled out other motives, seeking to quash speculation that it was a crime of passion or linked to Estermann's appointment. He described the Estermanns as "a model couple" and said Tornay had only recently broken up with an Italian girlfriend.

The news conference at which Navarro-Valls explained the deaths came only 12 hours after the shootings, and he sought to clear up any mystery about the deaths.

The Vatican tightly controls the release of information, and closely limits access inside its walls. It has been stung by criticism that it was not forthcoming in recent events, such as the Vatican bank scandal in the late 1970s and the death of Pope John Paul I in 1978.

Only a few hours before the killings, Pope John Paul II had named Estermann, 43, to head the Swiss Guards, an elite, 100-member corps of Swiss Catholic men founded in 1506 to help with papal security and perform ceremonial duties.

The president of the Swiss bishops conference, Bishop Amedee Grab, told reporters in Rome that Estermann's predecessor, Roland Buchs, would take temporary command of the Swiss Guards.

The investigation of the deaths will be carried out by a judicial official in the Vatican city-state, Navarro-Valls said. He said the bodies were found lying in the apartment foyer by a neighbor, the wife of another Swiss Guard, who heard loud noises and went to investigate.

An autopsy found two slugs from Tornay's gun in Estermann's body. The gun had only one bullet left in it, while another bullet was found in the ceiling.

John Paul, who learned the news Monday evening, told Estermann's parents in a message: "I learned with great sadness the incredible news of the violent death of your son."

The pope called the event "humanly incomprehensible." The killings sent shockwaves through Switzerland. Swiss President Flavio Cotti sent a letter to John Paul expressing the "sincere sympathy" of the Swiss government and people.

Estermann had accompanied John Paul on more than 50 foreign trips and had tried to shield the pontiff after a 1981 assassination attempt in St. Peter's Square when John Paul was wounded.

He joined the Swiss Guards in 1980 after four years as an officer in Switzerland's army, and had been acting commander since Buchs' retirement in October.

The Vatican did not say why it took so long for the appointment, but Navarro-Valls acknowledged the difficulty of recruiting a commander, given the position's modest wage. The job pays about $2,300 a month, and includes a large apartment.

"Despite our publicity, because it is coming so late in the year, means people will miss the opportunity," Wallace said. He said he expects a few dozen people to apply for the money, which will be divided between all of the accepted applications. Wallace himself will also be applying for help with child care.

He said GEO won $300,000 for the next school year, but not all of that is going to be going towards vouchers.

"We got a lot more [money] than people expected," Wallace said. "We have a lot more money to help parents with kids, more than ever before on this campus."

"Some of it will be used to facilitate a flex-care center," he said.

A flex-care center would be used as a child care facility worked around the hours of students. If a student-parent wanted to take a night class they would have a facility to take their children. As of now, many parents can't take certain classes because they cannot find child care in the evening or during odd hours. The center would fit around the parent's schedules.

Wallace said this is a particular problem for him and his wife, also a graduate student. He said he and his wife take turns on who gets to take a night class because they can't find child care in the evenings.

Wallace said it is his own experiences with child care issues which made him want to get involved with child care on campus.

"My wife wanted to start graduate school, but we couldn't afford it because of the child care costs," Wallace said.

Past and present states of child care at UMass

In the 1970s there were 270 children using child care services at seven different University affiliated child care centers.

In the 1980s the University needed more space moving the child care program into Bowditch and Farley lodges where the services are located today.

Child care services are provided in two buildings between the Warren McGuirk Stadium, and the softball fields near the Southwest residential area.

There are 78 spots for children at these buildings. There are also several part-week slots open, as well as several additional spots available in Skinner Hall.

Maryanne Gallagher, director of University Child Care, said there are as many as 86 children using the child care services at any one time. At the same time she said there are 60 to 75 families on the waiting list to get their children into a child care slot.

"I think we have a tremendously high-quality child care program," Gallagher said. "We don't have enough of it to meet the campus need. There's not enough to go around."

Gallagher said in the summer months, June through August, there is a high rate of turnover, and many people from the waiting list are offered slots, but some do not accept, throwing confusion into the mix.

The waiting list is sorted by age of the children and when the slot is desired. Sometimes people don't have to get on the waiting list because there is a slot open when they apply.

After the summer, Gallagher said the enrollment fills up quickly in the fall, and stays constant through the spring.

Child care services on campus are available for toddlers through pre-schoolers, from 15 months to five-years-old.

The Committee

The Campus Child Care Planning Committee, a child care task force, was formed in April 1997. The committee has been working on a report which it will turn into Chancellor David K. Scott later this month. Both Wallace and Gallagher are on the committee, as are members of the Graduate Student Senate, Student Government Association, GEO and the administration.

Wallace is confident the committee will make recommendations which the chancellor will institute. He said the committee would ask for an answer to the report by July, but Gallagher said it may take Scott until the fall to institute the changes recommended in the report.

She said the chancellor will have to show the report to other organizations on campus and it could be well into the fall before changes are implemented. She said the committee hasn't even finished their report yet.

"I really believe we're going to see more action on it [child care]," said Wallace.

Wallace said the committee will also recommend the development of a resource center. The center would help parents find information regarding child care in the area, how the vouchers work and to help them deal with other issues which may come up.

Confessions of a clutz

Since I won't get a chance to spill my neurotic ramblings for much longer, I've decided to tell you all one of my deepest, darkest secrets — namely, that I'm the clumsiest person on the face of the planet.

Now, you all know people like me; we can't walk without tripping over our own feet or we spill food all over ourselves. Often the clumsy individual is the butt of jokes. Me, I've earned my stripes in clumsiness a million times over so now I've come to accept this shortcoming of mine as a fact of life.

Seema Gangatirkar

See, in the past year, I've been attacked by furniture three times (don't ask), spilled no less than 30 gallons of Diet Coke and managed to trip over the ever-growing army of shoes in my room approximately 80 times.

My clumsiness began at the age of five, when playing "Dukes of Hazzard" with my brother (a much more agile individual). I slipped off the car and gave myself a concussion and a black eye. Since then, I have distinguished myself with an assortment of bruises, scratches, one stab wound, a concussion and a couple of spaghetti-stained blouses.

Never think, "Oh, that guy from 'Sliders,' Jerry O'Connell, would never fall on his face while giving a presentation in front of 600 people.

My friends think it's a hoot. One suggested getting those little Shout–It–Out wipes for me to carry around whenever we went out to eat. I protest; my clothes ought to share in whatever I eat.

But knowing a clumsy person and actually being clumsy are two very different things.

Being clumsy requires a type of laissez–faire attitude. A clumsy individual (especially one from birth; such as myself) must master the art of being absolutely cool while making a fool of herself. This, as many of you know, is difficult to do.

For example, tripping down a flight of stairs for absolutely no reason — you look stupid, no matter what you do. But if you have had practice at being clumsy, you can come out of the situation quite nicely. For instance, after you tumble to the ground, you can take a bow to your adoring fans. Or a simple, "Aw, shucks, it was nothing. I do it all the time," works as well.

Or, maybe you're the poor lap who drops her tray in the dining hall, shattering everyone's conversation with the sound of breaking dishware. It's difficult to slink away in a situation such as this; everyone's already looking at you. It's necessary to be graceful and try not to step into the mess you've created. If you step into the puddle of Diet Coke, you've completely eliminated any element of coolness you may have had before the dropping of the tray.

I've also seen people walk right into clear, glass doors. While I have never accomplished that (I have walked into a tree before), I do have a suggestion about how to gracefully extricate yourself from the embarrassment that comes out of not realizing that there is a door between you and your ultimate destination. Simply turn around and tell whoever may be around you, "That wasn't there just a second ago." I think that excuse might work once or twice, but better advice might be to watch where you're going.

But the worst thing about clumsiness is that it's not curable. That old adage, "once a clutz, always a clutz," certainly rings true no matter what stage of life you are currently in. And when you're being ungraceful, trust me, there is always another person around to see you fall flat on your face.

And never think, "Oh, that guy from 'Sliders,' Jerry O'Connell, would never fall on his face while giving a presentation in front of 600 people. And if he did, he would just slip into another dimension."

While you might feel the need to slip into another dimension or at least head for the nearest exit, keep in mind that clumsiness is common to everyone; some people just cover it up better than others.

Doonesbury By Garry Trudeau

A farewell to maybe

C. Taylor Conner

Regret, I found, is a soul–eater, a devourer of the self that feeds on time.

One of my greatest regrets in life is never having kicked my father's ass.

He lay there comatose in the hospital bed the day after he'd arrived back in Philadelphia from St. Maarten, and I told him he would have to return to health so I could wail on him on the hardwood. I practiced all summer — quick fadeaways, snaky baseline moves, soft floaters — before and after the accident, but to no avail.

He wasn't coming home any time soon.

In fact, the only time he came home I was already away at school. His fiancee and mother, accompanied by some of his medical team, led my father (who at that stage was out of the coma but severely brain–damaged) to the house, hoping the trip to familiar surroundings might help stir something in him. Anything.

Maybe I should have been there.

Regret.

The decision to proceed with the college plans was a no– brainer at the time. The old man had always stressed education, and so following what would seem to be his wishes seemed to be the right decision, the only decision he would permit. So we packed up the rental minivan and drove to Amherst. After September, I saw him twice thereafter — once at Thanksgiving and once at his funeral.

Maybe I shouldn't have been so far away, if even in school at all.

Regret.

Of course, if spending time with him had been so damned important to me in the first place, perhaps several more than four visits in five months of illness would have been the courageous choice. But I stayed holed up and alone in the house, slept in bizarre superstition in his bed for the half of the summer he wasn't there, and darted for UMass in the fall. The threat of pain rationalized even the most self–ish of behaviors.

There's no maybe about it. I should have been down there.

Regret.

Of course, I embellished the number of times I visited my father to my friends and co–workers, but my mother knew the truth. She lived five minutes away, and, after the first hospital visit, I'll estimate I saw her for a total of five hours for the remainder of the summer. I shut her out when she probably needed me as much as I needed her.

Once again, no–maybe. I definitely should have let her in.

Regret.

The snowing of friends as to my actual anguish continued once I began at UMass, where immediately I found a small group of dormmates willing to give me a shoulder. I even told two of them, just days before I flew to Philly for Christmas 1994, of my almost correct premonition that my father would be gone by the time I got home. Upon returning from break colder and yet somehow more focused, I shut them out. They knew too much.

A third no–maybe. There was no reason to protect myself by hurting others.

Regret.

She called early that Christmas Eve morning with some cockamamie excuse to come over to the house, her hand already tipped. I was braced and ready, as I suppose I had been for some time. But then the funeral came and went, and I had to make the call: stay for a while or go back to Mass. for itrack practice and Collegian Black Affairs Editor duty. Nobody thought I was ready, but I perhaps unwisely defied their expectations by going with the latter option. I departed a week after the Dec. 30 services.

Maybe I should have remained home to grieve in some capacity and comfort the family.

Regret.

Now here I am, four years later — older, but not necessarily wiser. Well, maybe a little bit wiser. I finally went to the grave site alone for the first time last winter break. Beneath my snow–soaked knees were two generations of Conner men, those who are and were my blood in spite of the fact I'm adopted.

For the first time since that initial hospital visit in July, 1994, I wept. The tears opened up what seemed to be the veritable sea of regret residing within me, and I made my apologies right there and then, unsure of when this magnificent watershed might cease. You have to capture your moments, fleeting as they often are.

Regret, I found, is a soul–eater, a devourer of the self that feeds on time. We must make our amends and be careful not to repeat what infected us in the first place. There is no amount of eloquence or stoicism or self–awareness that can save us from ourselves — believe me on this one.

Still, however, I do regret not having given my father a good, swift boot in the patookus on the blacktop.

But maybe I should make an exception and live with it.

Social Security woes

The budget surplus is the latest debate surrounding the solvency of Social Security. Both President Clinton and Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich have decided this surplus should be used to save the Social Security system instead of returning this money to taxpayers. This idea of using the surplus to shore up Social Security will not solve the program's core problem. The system is an utter failure and it is time for everyone, especially young people, to take notice of how government is stealing their financial future from them.

The Social Security system is in dire straits. The government will owe the Baby–Boomers their benefits when they retire, but it has no way to pay the bill.

Patrick X. Doyle, Jr.

Almost everyone acknowledges that the current system will not survive unless fundamental changes are made. Those who support the status quo, most notably the Social Security Administration, say that we only need to tinker with the system and the problem will be solved. Well, tinkering with this massive bureaucracy has never truly solved anything. Since the system's inception there have been over 50 adjustments, all of which proclaimed that the problem had been fixed. The latest of these so–called "solutions," a tax increase enacted in 1983, had its proponents claiming that Social Security would remain trouble–free for 75 years. Yet, since 1983, the estimated date when the system will go bankrupt has been moved forward each year. It is currently believed by many that 2012 is the fateful year — 46 years earlier than they claimed.

In 2012, it is predicted that Social Security payments will exceed tax revenues. The government is going to find itself in a precarious situation at this point. It will be necessary for the government to find a way to pay Social Security beneficiaries and it will not be able to rely on the Social Security "trust fund" to bail itself out. For the past 60 year, the government has told the American people repeatedly that the money workers paid into Social Security was being saved in a trust fund. Upon retirement, contributors would receive back the money they supposedly paid into the trust fund.

Unfortunately, this is not the case. In 1939, the first generation of retirees received Social Security benefits but paid little or nothing into the system, enjoying a veritable windfall. They contributed little and received a great deal. Moreover, the government simply decided to transfer money from one generation to the next in order for Franklin Roosevelt and Social Security's advocates to win "costless" votes. Social Security funds have also been used to pay for other government operations.

The government falsely assumed that the population of the United States would keep growing and there would always be more taxpayers to support the number of retirees receiving Social Security benefits. That was wishful thinking. The Baby–Boomers have thrown a money– wrench into those plans. Young people have started blaming the baby–boomers for the collapse of Social Security since there is no longer a large ratio of workers–to–recipient. What young people need to realize is that the baby–boom generation is not the true cause of the problem. Why should that generation be blamed for simply being larger than others? In reality the government and its advocates caused the problem.

The Social Security system is in dire straits. The government will owe the baby–boomers their benefits when they retire, but it has no way to pay the bill. The government looks to Generation X to pay back what the government squandered. Yet the baby–boom generation is simply too large and Generation X is too small. In 1950, there were 16 workers supporting every retiree on Social Security. In 1993, that number plummeted to three workers for every one retiree. By 2025, that number will fall to two to one!

The government is not likely to officially renege on its promise to pay the baby–boomer's Social Security benefits and will attempt to pay something regardless of its burden on the paychecks of younger generations. The money that the government will need is staggering. By 2015, the government will be short $55 to $60 billion for Social Security. By 2020, the shortfall will increase to over $230 billion. This shortfall will occur when today's college students will be in their prime earning years. To raise the necessary funds the government can either raise taxes, borrow additional money, or cut benefits. All three of these options damaged young peoples' job prospects and their ability to support themselves.

The idea of the government using the budget surplus to save Social Security is laughable. Why should the American people trust the same government that has repeatedly lied about how it managed their contributions from the outset of this program? Instead of being funneled into the black hole, the surplus should be given back to citizens to start a private retirement account. Historically, private savings accounts provide a much healthier return than Social Security.

The lack of confidence in Social Security is well founded: it was inevitable that the government could no longer hide the fact that it has been stealing from day one. Far worse, young people are being forced to pay into a system from which they will get little in return. The surplus idea is only a "band–aid" solution for a mortally wounded program.

Life and how to live it

Tanya Mannes

Are you a cynic? Does the PVTA pull up just as you've started walking home? Are you always one match away from the scratch card instant win? But what if you are the kid with the mad skills— you're caller number nine; you find a $20 bill in the gutter. These near misses and close calls make a random collage of your life. Several times a day, seconds count the difference between totally different events, two or more scenarios resembling each other only in that you are the protagonist. Sometimes you ponder what could have happened, and you feel a bit empty. Would it be different if...?

On one of our vast American stretches of highway, you might hit the cruise control and lean back, sure that nothing can touch you. There you sit, perhaps holding a cup of iced coffee. Actually, while you accelerate on the open road, you could still experience some special, random event. You are surrounded by people, each one in a metal cocoon, heading in the same direction, and fate might decide to throw something — or someone — your way.

I am always comfortably aware of my fellow drivers. From my peripheral vision, I take mental note of the minivan with the harried father at the wheel, the old woman scratching her chin in the Nova, and the teen couple in the Mercury. But none of these hold my attention to the rear– view mirror like your average sunglass–wearing bad boy with a trendy haircut. For some reason, even boring suburban guys assume a certain je ne sais quoi behind the wheel of a Golf. Is he listening to Wu–Tang or the Dead?

The other day, on Route 9 in Hadley, I became entranced with such an "average Joe." He tailed me right onto Route 91 South. "Joe" pulled up next to me and looked over with a grin. I grinned back from behind my shades. There we were, at 75 mph; we couldn't see each other's eyes, and our cars stayed flush as though tied with invisible fishing line. Joe sped ahead, waggling his fingers at me. I followed, visions of an unorthodox liaison dancing in my head. At a rest stop? Warning lights on, in the breakdown lane? The center strip? The possibilities, in theory, were endless.

Fate had, indeed, let someone reach me when I thought I was untouchable. Alas, after a few on–road antics, Joe took an exit, so I continued on the straight and narrow path to the line... my father was actually writing to four women — at once.?

"What a player!" I nodded approvingly.

"He proposed marriage to all four of them, simultaneously, by mail, before he left for Africa to fight for the Portuguese colonies. My mother was the first one to write back, so my dad took that to mean that she was his fated bride. They were married in Portugal. When he returned, they started a life together in New Bedford, and before they had a chance to buy drapes for their apartment, I was on the way."

"Happily ever after, Gab, eh? Well, depending on your definition of "happily," I mused.

What is happiness, if not satisfaction with the choices you have made, either actively or through default? Perhaps things could have been different, but they stand as is. If you overanalyze, you could miss the enjoyment integral to the fragile, woven spiderweb of living. At first it looks like a random mess of tangles, but on closer observation you see the fine knotwork and design.

Either Gabriel is a tribute to the Portuguese Postal Service, or some benevolent 'randomness' brought her parents together. Sometimes things happen for a reason, a sort of method to what seems like madness. That anonymous driver on the highway could be your lover, soulmate or stalker. That marriage proposal could be the link to beauty or destruction. That plum job you snag after graduation, 45 grand and perks, could be your upwardly mobile dream, or a nightmare a la The Firm. Don't be cynical, dwelling on yesterday. You could be one step away from greatness. All you can do is trust in fate to make your best–case–scenario materialize.

Becky Edelman

Something strange happens to a person their senior year. It's not just the realization that pretty soon you're going to have to stop acting like a kid and start planning your future. It's the little things, like realizing that you haven't stepped foot in a dorm in almost two years.

Senior pictures, class rings, seniorities — it's a deja vu of high school, but it's different. In high school you had college to look forward to. Am I really supposed to get excited about having to wake up early for the next 45 years? Am I ready to accept the fact that I will only be able to wear sweatpants on the weekends? Absolutely not!

I have a roommate who is famous for her countdowns: last back–to–school shopping, last pre–registration, last Homecoming as a student (last tailgating forever?), last Wednesday in October — you get the point. And although we all make fun of her for being too sappy, there is a part of me that longs to be a freshman again, and here are some reasons why:

Going Out — If you're lucky as a freshman, you have a decent fake ID. Trust me when I tell you that going out will never be so much fun, standing outside the bar with sweaty palms holding onto your ID for dear life. Knowing that if it gets taken, life as you know it will be over. This is the point where you start cursing the year you were born in, and longing for the day you turn 21. Trust me, it's all down hill from there. By the time 21 rolls around, you're sick of drinking Long Island Iced Teas until you feel sick. I mean, you can only get drunk and make a fool of yourself so many times before it starts getting old, really old. People just don't think it's as funny when you're making a fool out of yourself when you are 22 as they did when you were 18, trust me. So you freshmen counting down the days until you're 21 — don't forget to appreciate every day that you're not.

Relationships — By the time senior year rolls around, chances are you hang out with the same crowd every weekend. The phrase "Been there, done that" comes to mind. For those seniors that do have committed relationships, tension often arises as you both begin to realize that pretty soon you are going to have to make some huge decisions. For those of us who have managed to remain single, the line "I like you but I don't want a girlfriend/boyfriend" seems to be the theme lately. There is a freshman version of this line — the old "I think we should just be friends," — but the difference is that freshman year you know you have three more years of college. This makes moving on to something better (and believe me, it will be better) much easier.

Letting go of things your senior year is hard — and I'm not just talking about relationships. You realize that pretty soon, life will be turned upside down. Who wants to give up the comfort of anything — especially people we care about?

Classes — Well, by senior year, one of two things seems to happen — either you're stuck taking 21 credits your final semester due to having put off classes for the past three years or you need 12 credits but you've finished your major. For those of you who haven't realized it, not only do they not offer the same variety of classes in the spring as they do in the fall, but by the last semester you honestly have no interest in taking any of the classes that are offered. I mean, once you've taken Consumer Studies 176, what more do you really have to look forward to? (Well, except maybe Consumer Studies 276.)

Pizza — I'll never forget the first time I stood in line at Antonio's. It wasn't just the pizza — the whole atmosphere had me standing in the middle of North Pleasant St. with my mouth open. Guess what? You're not going to believe me, and I hope that this has only happened to me, but... I'm sick of pizza. I think my body has just gotten so used to eating pizza at 1:30 a.m. on Saturday nights that it's just lost its appeal.

Dorms — I (gasp) actually miss the dorms! I mean, I may not miss the musty smell of the cigarette burned, 70s yellow carpet and stepping over puke on Sunday mornings, but there are some things about the dorms that I long for (those of you who live off–campus can understand the importance of free toilet paper).

It was always nice coming home late at night, any night, and knowing that there is always at least one person awake and willing to make your night even longer. Okay, so I like the fact that I can walk around barefoot in my apartment without worrying what I'm stepping on. But I really miss all the excitement of the dorms — you know, sneaking beer into the dorms in your backpack or your laundry basket. It was never fun getting written up, but let me tell you it's a lot better than getting arrested.

And what about fire drills? Okay, call me crazy, but what better way to find out who's doing what than by standing at the end of your dorm hallway during a fire drill and seeing who comes out of what rooms.

So, here are my final words of advice. Take lots of pictures. College flies by. I think they may be the fastest years of your life. Which is kind of too bad, because they're also the best.

Letters to the Editor

BMCP cancels Funk–o–thon

To the Editor:

As many of you may have heard, this year BMCP (Black Mass Communications Project) will not be bringing you it's traditional annual Funk–o–thon party. We understand that it has become one of the most highly anticipated Five–College area events and we apologize for the break in tradition.

Unfortunately, BMCP is experiencing structural problems which have interfered with our ability to function as the cohesive unit necessary to plan and safely execute an event of the Funk–o–thon's magnitude. This decision was made with the safety of the students and the future of BMCP in mind.

It has come to our attention that other individuals are promoting an off–campus event using the same name, the symbol widely recognized as BMCP's logo, calling it "the annual Funk–o–thon" on their flyers and posting them on campus. We, the board of BMCP, want to make it perfectly clear that we are strongly opposed to this blatant act of misappropriation and disrespect. We did not authorize this use and we are in no way in support of this event.

BMCP is now in the process of restructuring our constitution, our organization, our programming and our focus. We want your input. In the 1960s, '70s and '80s, BMCP provided the University of Massachusetts community with educational and social programs as well as peer support and these are the ideals we intend to bring back to the organization.

If you're tired of chaos, opportunism and disunity and you want to be a part of the rebuilding of the oldest and largest ALANA organization on campus, join us at our next meeting Wednesday May 6th in the New Africa House library at 7 p.m. as we discuss elections and the direction of BMCP. Come with one other thing in mind: BMCP needs officers and students whose goals are experience and education, not profit. Please join us as we take back our organization.

Protest early end of Central Springfest

To the editor:

At 10:20 p.m. this past Saturday evening I was approached by members of the UMass police department and told unequivocally that the Central Springfest would be shut down at 11:00 p.m. The officer in charge told me that there had been several noise complaints from town residents during the day and the previous evening, and that for this reason the show was being shut down.

My immediate reactions to this announcement were feelings of anger and powerlessness. Our Area Government had been working for two months on this event, and to have it shut down just as it was reaching its climax was not something that I wanted to see. We had spent hours getting all of the proper paperwork filled out and signed, and the show was slated to go until 1:00 a.m. The police were not asking for my opinion however, and I was obliged to say that whatever they wanted to be done would be done.

After having the sound turned down and many conversations with our "servants and protectors," the show was "allowed" to go on until midnight.

At 11:40 p.m., before the final act started, I told the crowd that the concert was being shut down at midnight by the police, and asked any students who felt that this was an inappropriate use of police power to file a written complaint at the police office. Not long afterwards, I was physically removed from the stage area and encircled by numerous angry police and University personnel. I was threatened with arrest on various charges including inciting a riot and told that I had better do something quickly about the situation.

Apparently the hundreds of students in attendance did not have the right to know what was going on, or the right to complain through the proper channels.

This was my first interaction with police in any sort of confrontational manner, and I was amazed at the mindset they were in, and the tactics that they used. It seems that if numerous noise complaints were received Friday night and the police knew that the concert was going to last all weekend, a logical solution to the situation would be to see if the noise level could be lowered. We would have been perfectly willing to decrease the decibels to a level that was reasonable if we had known that there were complaints, and the problem could have been solved before it even fully surfaced.

Instead it seems that no one wanted to take responsibility for a problem in the making until it reached a crisis, and the outcome was sure to leave everyone with a bad taste in their mouths.

What is most distressing to me about this occasion is that the police considered their solution to this problem reasonable and felt threatened when I exercised my rights. How is it that a force that was established to serve and protect citizens has become an authoritarian institution that we are all in some way afraid of, and what can we do to rectify this problem?

The shut down of our concert an hour early was hardly a travesty of justice, but it was definitely an inappropriate and poorly thought out use of police power. If we bristle and make a stink about small injustices, maybe the big ones will once again be considered unconscionable.

I urge those who were enjoying the concert Saturday night, and who were upset at its untimely end, to use their power as citizens and file a formal complaint at the police station. If we stand up for what we believe in, it will be forthcoming.

Need for Native American studies program

To the Editor:

In response to Paul Hayes' editorial from Monday, April 27, I must say I am worried about you! Your comments made concerning the "need" for a Native American studies program are disconcerting at best. In fact, your very statement proves the point for me! Do you know how much of the Native American's history and legacy have been suppressed? Do you realize that there is much to be learned from a history which is thousands of years old? I once read a speech given by Red Cloud, a Seneca leader, which spoke about the fact that upon the arrival of the colonists the Native American Tribal Nations existed without the need for such things as jails or taxes. And he couldn't understand why the colonists thought they could offer a better alternative. I certainly am curious to know as well.

Perhaps, the need to be met in the history department is the need for truth. Do you also realize that there are anthropologists in this day and age who are still trying to suppress the whole truth about the population of the Native Americans in this very region? Knowing the scope of the population may be trivial to you, but being Native American, I would simply like to know the whole truth, the good, the bad and the ugly. I can also see why people would not like to delve into these issues because "ignorance is indeed bliss."

It is time to come to terms with how the "freedom" we enjoy today was obtained. I cannot ignore the fact that I am "Americanized," it is a part of me as much as my Mic Mac heritage is. We must admit to the tyranny which enveloped the Native Americans. The land was inhabited by people who used the land efficiently and without environmental degradation. It was forcibly taken.

The minority group you have discarded with the stroke of your pen have been long enough discarded. And we simply won't be silent any longer. Your column is displayed on the wall at the Josephine White Eagle (JWE) Cultural Center. Come up and talk with your readers. We are located in Chadbourne, in the basement. We'll help you further understand our need for a Native Americans studies program, and its benefit to the UMass community.

Thanks to Richman for Holocaust Memorial week

To the editor:

I wanted to thank Michael Richman for all of the hours of work he put into coordinating Hillel/Jewish Student Union's observance of Holocaust Memorial week.

By being the chairman of the Holocaust Commemorative Committee, Michael worked for months to get speakers like Louise Kehoe and Professor James Young to share their experiences on the subject. He along with his co–chair Vicki Bragg did an amazing job planning the Holocaust Memorial Service that was held Thursday evening in the Cape Cod Lounge. The service brought people from various cultures together to remember the Holocaust and promise that it will never be forgotten. It was a beautiful experience.

Kubrick recalls Cruise & Kidman

Perfectionist director dumps Jennifer Jason Leigh in latest movie buzz

By Bryan McAllister
Collegian Staff

Tom Cruise will be wanting plenty of shut-eye after finishing Eyes Wide Shut, the Stanley Kubrick film starring Cruise's wife Nicole Kidman. The super-secret production, said to be a psychosexual drama, began in November 1996 and was finally thought to be finished this past February.

However, Kubrick, known for demanding numerous takes and absolute perfection, has now called Cruise and Kidman back to London for reshooting. The acclaimed director of 2001: A Space Odyssey and The Shining also decided to remove all scenes involving Jennifer Jason Leigh and refilmed them with actress Marie Richardson.

Cruise won't be taking much of a break, though if he wants his Mission: Impossible 2 to arrive in theaters next summer. After dismissing Oliver Stone as a possible director, Cruise is in talks with Face/Off's John Woo to helm the sequel. Stone, meanwhile, has assembled an all-star cast for his football drama On Any Given Sunday. Al Pacino, Tommy Lee Jones, David Duchovny, Cameron Diaz and, yes, rapper-producer Sean "Puffy" Combs will all appear in the film. Pacino will play a coach, Puffy a football player.

You know it's the official start of the summer movie season when previews for Godzilla feature the tag-line "Size does matter." This Friday marks the arrival of the comet- thriller Deep Impact, and then the blockbuster monster movie comes to town May 20. In between, we'll be subject to Robert Redford's two hour, 44 minute The Horse Whisperer on May 15, which should be exactly that — a whisper.

The Godzilla team of producer Dean Devlin and director Roland Emmerich will reunite with Will Smith, whom they worked with in Independence Day, on the sci-fi epic The Mark, about a man who receives a mark on his body from a dying stranger that brings him superhuman powers. Superhuman powers is exactly what they might need if they expect to beat George Lucas, who will release the first of his new Star Wars prequels next Memorial Day and the subsequent two in 2000 and 2001. Look for perhaps a peek at the first prequel in Godzilla previews this May.

DreamWorks, the new studio formed by Steven Spielberg, Jeffrey Katzenberg and David Geffen, will get a big test this year. The studio has been so-so thus far with releases like The Peacemaker and Mousehunt, but good television output thanks to "Spin City." This year, DreamWorks will count on Spielberg's Saving Private Ryan, but the big film on tap is the full-length animated feature The Prince of Egypt. A scoping retelling of the Old Testament epic of Moses and the Ten Commandments, the film features the latest in digital technology and possibly the most impressive cast of voices ever assembled. Michelle Pfieffer, Val Kilmer, Sandra Bullock, Steve Martin, Jeff Goldblum, Ralph Fiennes, Patrick Stewart, Martin Short, Mel Brooks, Danny Glover and Natalie Portman.

Tom Cruise's penetrating gaze will be back in Mission: Impossible 2, due out next summer.

Page and Plant make a blissful return

WALKING INTO CLARKSDALE
Jimmy Page & Robert Plant
Atlantic

Now this is an interesting pairing. The bombastic guitar heroics of Jimmy Page and the vocal histrionics of Robert Plant teamed with the bare-bones recording style of erstwhile indie curmudgeon Steve Albini — the same Steve Albini who's sat behind the boards with the Pixies, PJ Harvey, Nirvana and Bush.

Considering Page's reputation for knowing his own mind in the studio, the choice of Albini was less-than-obvious. Judging from the results heard on Walking Into Clarksdale, their collaboration was an unqualified success. Albini has perfectly framed the classic trappings of Led Zeppelin while not letting things get out of control, a tendency that plagued the last collection of all-original Page/Plant material, Zep's 1979's In Through the Out Door. Instead, Page and Plant have created a beast, something exciting and vital.

As one should rightly expect, the ghost of Led Zeppelin looms large on this set as Walking Into Clarksdale is a step forward while looking back all at once. The album echoes the experimental leanings of Zep's mid-period, namely the individual stylistic workouts of Physical Graffiti and the loose eclecticism of Houses of the Holy. Nothing on Clarksdale sounds forced, and much of the credit for that deserves to go to Albini, the finest studio technician of our time.

Bassist Charlie Jones and drummer Michael Lee, both of whom toured with Page and Plant on their world tour supporting No Quarter, are back and do exactly what they're supposed to: stand back and let Page and Plant shine.

While Page and Plant don't really add anything new to their legacy, they re-visit old themes and styles — "Most High" blends Celtic signatures with Middle Eastern mysticism in the finest Zep tradition — in a way that doesn't make them sound like old hacks going through the motions. A surprise, and a pleasant one at that. Who would've thought. B+

PEOPLE MOVE ON Bernard Butler
Creation/Columbia

The Butler has done it. As the title of his debut solo offering proclaims, Bernard Butler has moved on.

Already having established himself as the finest guitarist of his generation through his work with Suede (a.k.a. The London Suede), Butler has re-surfaced after almost joining The Verve, recording some silly singles with David McAlmont and basically being a hired guitar hand around London. We always knew he was better than that, and now he's proved it. In a big way.

After looking at the album title and glancing at the song names, it's easy to see where Butler is coming from, and where he's aiming: straight at the heart. Nearly everything here is drawn from changes in his life post-Suede, including his marriage, the birth of his son and, well, him moving on.

The opening "Woman I Know" is a tender ballad which wouldn't be out of place on a Neil Young album while "When You Grow," written to his son, almost sounds like a lullaby.

The real revelation of People Move On is Butler's voice. It's a tour-de-force, with all the emotional power of Richard Ashcroft and the fragility of Thom Yorke wrapped into one. The fact that he never sang in Suede now seems criminal.

"Not Alone" is perhaps the finest single of the year, a glorious

We've got some of the BEST jobs on campus!

NEWS
What do burning buildings, famous speakers, government scandal, peeping toms and the best resume builder on campus have in common? The News Department of the Collegian!

As a news associate or news correspondent you will be covering the latest issues and events on campus. We have beats where you can gain experience covering everything from the latest crimes to the biggest names that come to campus.

If you want to be a competitive candidate for internships and jobs, nothing on campus will give you hands-on experience like working for the Collegian News Department. Nothing will give employers a better sample of your writing than news articles. So come down to the Collegian and ask for Jill Carroll or call the News Desk at 545-1762.

SPORTS
Here in the Sports Department we cover a wide range of occurrences in the world of sports. Obviously, the main purpose of the page is to cover UMass sports, but we also run weekly columns on pro baseball, the NFL, NHL, NBA, and college football and basketball. In addition, we also run a weekly "Around the Horn" column, which allows any writer to take a crack at giving their viewpoint on the weeks sporting events.

Another plus in the Sports Department is the opportunity for travel. Just to name a few sites, UMass teams will play in Colorado, Michigan, and Hawaii this year. Last year writers travelled to Boyertown, Penn. for the Atlantic 10 baseball tournament and to Fenway Park for the baseball Beanpot, as well as various other locations.

If you want to write for the Sports Department, just stop down to 113 Campus Center, and ask for Michael Kobylanski. You can also reach me by phone at 545-1749, or by e-mail at kobo3@hotmail.com.

EDITORIAL/ OP
Editorial writers are the glitterati of the newsroom. Columnists are the closest thing to celebrity that you will find on the UMass campus.

Are you sick of blathering on about your opinions to random people, or keeping your feelings bottled up inside until they become bitter pills of rage? Then come down and write! Ed/Op writers have the ability to share their opinions with the whole campus, to anger the administration, or to tick off the SGA. For next semester, we are hoping to have a core group of writers who are eager, well-informed and articulate. If you're interested, come on down to the Collegian, ask for Mike Messaros. Or if you're a scaredy-cat, just give a call at 545-1491.

DIVERSITY
The Massachusetts Daily Collegian invites and encourages all to contribute to its diversity pages.

These pages, which include the Black Affairs page, the Multicultural Affairs page, the Women's Issues page, the Jewish Affairs page, the GLBT (Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual and Transgender) issues page, and the Developing Nations page, present an opportunity for those who may not be extensively represented or covered in the regular pages of the Collegian.

The diversity desks present a forum where students may voice their opinions concerning issues which are relevant to them.

If you want to get involved in news reporting or writing, please come down and fill out an application.

If you are tired of not being heard, call Senior Diversity Editor Edgar Barros at 545-1851 or send email to ebarros@student.umass.edu.

D LIVING
From reviewing the latest Dave Matthews Band album to interviews with Wycleffe Jean, Arts & Living is the place to be. We're currently looking for new writers to cover music, theater, film, TV, fashion and more down at the Collegian. This past year, we've given our thoughts on the Grammies, the Oscars, concerts in Northampton and productions at Bowker. The great thing about Arts & Living is that no experience is necessary —all you need are good writing skills and a love for all forms of entertainment. In addition to new writers, we're also hiring a music associate, fine arts associate and film associate for next semester. Applications are due May 8 and can be obtained down at the Collegian, or ask for Bryan at 545-1361.

Y EDITING
The Collegian is also looking for interested students to work one night per week as copy and night editors. Requirements for both positions include excellent spelling, grammar and communication skills.

Copy editors should be Collegian staff members, have some editing experience and knowledge of Associated Press style. They are responsible for writing accurate headlines for all news stories as well as reading through all stories for accuracy and consistency.

Anyone interested in either of these positions should visit the Collegian office in the 113 Campus Center and speak with Victoria Groves or call 545-1809.

HOTO
The Photo Department is looking for creative photographers with at least one year experience for technician and staff positions. Photographers should have their own SLR camera. Technicians are responsible for developing black and white negatives, laying out photos for news and scanning negatives in photoshop. Knowledge of photoshop and layout is recommended but not required.

Photographers interact with all departments at the Collegian as well as members of the Five College Area, so good communication skills are a must. The photo department covers all five college events, and UMass sports and area music concerts. This year photographers covered speakers such as Ray Bradbury and Coretta Scott-King in addition to events such as the NCAA Basketball Tournament and Elton John and Wyclef Jean shows. If you are interested in working for the photo department please contact Lauren Kosky to fill out an application and schedule a portfolio review, or call the photo desk at 545-1701.

APHICS
We're what makes the Collegian look good. In the Collegian Graphics Department we are responsible for designing all the advertisements that you see in each edition. National and local companies pay us to make them look good. We're responsible for making each day's paper possible too.

Want to get first hand experience using state-of-the-art technology? In the Collegian Graphics department we have nothing but the latest equipment that is available. Nothing looks better on a resume than showing that you are skilled in the software and hardware applications in demand today.

Positions available include advertisement designers and editorial production staff, who work to layout the newspaper to send it to the printer.

In addition, the Collegian is looking to hire students to work on its ever-improving web site. This includes day and night positions. If interested, contact Dave Voldan in the Graphics Department at 545-1864.

The Collegian is Hiring from now 'till the end of the semester for Fall '98. Visit our friendly offices conveniently located in the Campus Center. We're room 113 in the lower level, down the escalators, on the opposite end from the ATM machines. Stop by to pick up an application or talk with an editor. For general questions call 545-3500.

END HITS
Fugazi
Dischord

There's this progression in the music of Fugazi that can be traced from their earliest output to their newest work. While the essence of fiery music and strong political comment are still evident, the music has grown outward, more experimental. Their newest album, End Hits, is a rough but stylish collection of songs that gives us a look at Fugazi's newly expanded musical repertoire. The iconoclast band has recently moved towards jazz and experimental music, and while it was evident on the last two albums, on this one, this new direction is in full bloom.

Picking up where their last album, Red Medicine, left off almost three years ago, the album busts out of the gates with "Break," with some off kilter guitar lines, a little piano and an off beat drum beat. When Ian MacKaye's vocals come in, it's a shock. They are subdued, and the guitar plays in a way that it matches the vocal melody. You know you are in for something new.

The album still rocks, but keeps with it an experimental vision. Songs stop and start again at odd times. Vocals are traded. "Foreman's Dog" and "Caustic Acrostic" are the two straight out rockers that lighten the album, but what gives the work depth are the surprising "Floating Boy" and "Pink Frosty." On the former, Guy Picciotto breaths swimming lyrics over drawn out sounds. "Pink Softie" may be the quietest song Fugazi has ever written, and MacKaye's vocals whisper softly across the music.

If anything is disappointing about this album, it's the lyrics. One of the best things about the last two albums, which showed off the band's new direction, were the lyrics. On this one, they seem thrown off at times. The best might be in "Caustic Acrostic," which seem to be stream of conscience. Also, "No Surprise," which is sung with great restraint by Picciotto, contains one of the most poignant sentiments ever in a Fugazi song, as he wishes for a time where the government was not keeping track of us: "No C.I.A./ No N.S.A./ No satellite/ Will map our veins."

This album takes a while to get into, but it is worth it, just like the last two. A– (Mike Messaros)

OVER THE JAMES Avail
Lookout

Avail has soul, end of story. If you want to know what has kept Avail on top of the punk scene for so long, what makes every album they release incredible, the answer is simple: they have soul. While other bands tend to lose the ferocity and energy of their attack when they incorporate other styles of music, Avail has added elements of folk and rock and roll and still rip it up.

Start with Tim Barry's vocals, without ripping his throat to shreds, without sounding like a whiny high school brat, he evokes a variety of emotions with his voice. Then you add Gwomper on bass, Joe Banks on guitar, Erik Larson on drums, and of course Beau Beau the cheerleader and you have the backbone of one of the most inspirational bands around. Listening to Over The James, evokes the spirit of bands like Gorilla Biscuits, Minor Threat and Swiz. The songs make you feel like you can accomplish anything if you could just muster the intensity of Avail.

By combining the ferocity of pure punk and hardcore with almost folk interludes, they have blessed us with an incredible song. "Deepwood" opens the album up and immediately you feel your legs shaking, you have to stand up. "New #2" is second and you notice yourself bobbing your head. "August" with its mellow intro brings a huge smile to your face, and then when it kicks in you start to pace your room. Then the anthemic "Fall Apart" hits you and you are jumping up and down, screaming, pointing your finger. "Nickel Bridge" slams in with all the ferocity of a melodic Kiss It Goodbye and by the time the songs chorus kicks in you wonder if there is a better band around.

Every album Avail has released has been incredible, so it's hard to imagine this one is their best. However, this album has no filler, this all pure unadulterated punk. Over The James is an inspirational, angry, introspective and political album that may be the best to come out of the punk genre in a long time. A+ (Adam Dlugacz)

MASS NERDER
All
Epitaph

I've always thought of All as simply being the Descendents without Milo Aukerman on vocals, and other then the time that Dave Smalley fronted this band, I haven't paid much attention to them. Well Mass Nerder only re- enforces my beliefs.

Chad Price is a fine vocalist and of course no pop-punk trio can match Bill Stevenson, Stephen Egerton and Karl Alvarez, and they even have Milo doing backing vocals, so there's no doubt that this is a solid album. But that's the problem, it's solid and unspectacular, while it's slightly more proficient, it could really be any pop-punk album. The albums slightly darker then the Descendents, but it's the same nerd against the world theme that Milo is the poster boy for.

Songs like "World's On Heroin," "I'll Get There," "Perfection" and "Greedy" are all really good songs. Heck, they're better then most pop-punk songs out there. At the same time I'd rather have Milo singing them. If you need to buy an album to hold you over till the next Descendents, buy this, otherwise you can pass. B– (A.D.)

CLOSED CAPTIONED RADIO
The Bogmen
Arista

It is both fun and interesting to hear some experimenting with the verse–chorus–verse–bridge song structure. Without ever breaking the formula, The Bogmen have created some strange and altogether enjoyable songs on their latest album Closed Captioned Radio, which transcends the limitations of a cookie–cutter songwriting structure and ends up being in the realm of art–rock.

The tape effects on the first song "Failing Systems" hook the listener right away in conjunction with the catchy chorus. "Speedfreak Lullaby" and "Mexico" are also two great songs which rely heavily on hooks and bizarre lyrics. The words reach new levels of eccentricity on "Dark Waltz" with lyrics such as, "Take some more ecstasy, conquer the night...Do the dark waltz, bite the girls neck, tongues in your ears, send chills down your back." Also included are a few surprises, including a cover of Paul Anka's "You Are My Destiny."

With Closed Captioned Radio, The Bogmen have perfected a new kind of "rock of the weird." Love it or hate it, you have to admit it's something different. A– (Kevin Monahan)

THE PRINCETON REVIEW

Public Enemy back in style

By Adam Dlugacz

What's going on, fellow hip–hoppers? By now you should all be enjoying the butterfried jams but unfortunately I forgot a few. "Body Rock" by Mos Def, Q–Tip and Tesh should have been on top of the list, sorry. The Lyricist Lounge on Rawkus Records is out now and you should probably pick it up. I was listening to the Craig Mack album, Project: Funk Da World. What happened to that cat? He was the man a couple of years ago, and now he's no one. Well that's hip hop for you.

• HOT BUTTERFRIED TRACK — "We Be Clubbin'" (re–mix) by Ice Cube and DMX. For some reason I've been sleeping on this song, even though it's on the Craig G, Ps– Nice tape that I listen to almost every day. This song is hot, I have a terrible tendency of playing it over and over again. Ice Cube claims that he added DMX to get some "grit" in the song. DMX comes in barking; he's nasty, end of story.

• LL Cool J finally busted back with "Third Round Knockout." It seems that all he's managed to do is get Wyclef involved, cause other then the line "99 percent of your fans don't exist," I'm not really feeling this. Then again he does yell a bit, something he hasn't done in a while, but It's no "Mamma Said Knock You Out."

• Coccoa Brovaz played at Central Day this past Saturday. I missed them because some playa hayta (I had to throw that into one of my columns, I'm really not that corny) told me it was at 6 p.m. I got there at 6:15 p.m. to find out that they were really cool guys who put on a great show and were now hanging out with their friends. That's what you get when you decide to set things off at 1 p.m., a day where your head is in the clouds and you seem to miss everything you tried to do.

• Ultramagnetic MC's are re–uniting for a new album. You can get their first album at the Grow Room.

• New Dirty Harry and DJ Clue tapes are out. Both are en fuego, although Clue needs to get one and stop talking over every song he plays.

• All I'm going to say is Knicks and Yankees, "We told you that we won't stop." Just play "Deja Vu" and think about those two teams.

• Public Enemy is back; that's right the crew who blessed us with "It Takes A Nation Of Millions" is back to set the record straight. For those of you who don't know, PE set the standard for consciousness and awareness in hip–hop. Forget about free–style skills or tracks that got your booty shaking — Chuck D dropped lyrics that made your mind move. While most people have tried to stop hip–hop by pointing out the violence and blatant sexuality, others tried to silence Public Enemy because of their political views. Chuck D spoke his mind, he was willing to target everyone from John Wayne to base heads to 911 and he made sense. When Arizona refused to recognize Martin Luther King Day, PE called them on it with their brilliant and surprisingly successful "By the Time I Get To Arizona."

Hip–hop has strayed from the days when Public Enemy ruled into a world of crystal, whips, drugs and clothes. Groups like Tribe Called Quest, De La Soul and Common have been battling the wack forces of rap and have recently been aided in their struggle by the comeback of Rakim and Gang Starr. All of that has been setting the stage for the return of Public Enemy. They did the entire He Got Game soundtrack and have a full length of their own coming out. In case you're wondering if they fell off, check "Kill Em Live" from the Bullworth soundtrack, where Chuck proclaims "I'm the last angry man standing." Amen.

Black woman recalls Negro League

By Joseph White
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — "Peanut" Johnson spent hot, dusty summer days playing pickup baseball as a child in the 1940s and dreamed at night of making the big leagues.

But there were already two strikes against that dream: Johnson is black and a woman.

Yet she succeeded, overcoming rejection by the all–white women's league that began playing during World War II and becoming one of only three women to play in the Negro leagues.

Despite that achievement, Mamie "Peanut" Johnson, Toni Stone and Connie Morgan have been all but forgotten in baseball lore. "Those were some of the most enjoyable years of my life," said the 65–year–old Johnson, a former pitcher who learned to throw a curveball from none other than Satchel Paige. "Striking out the fellows made me happy."

Johnson, the only one of the three women still alive, helps coach Little League baseball in Washington, D.C., these days. Her eyes twinkle when she speaks of her stint with the Indianapolis Clowns in the mid–1950s and of her carefree days as a youth in Ridgeway, S.C., where a rock wrapped with masking tape and stitched with twine would pass for a baseball.

"I played with the fellows most of the time because the girls did what the boys did, because there was nothing else to do," Johnson said. "You got a chance to do just about anything you wanted to do, and pitching was my thing."

By 1947, Johnson's family had moved to the nation's capital, and Jackie Robinson and Brooklyn Dodgers president Branch Rickey were integrating the major leagues.

Johnson naively thought the same would happen with the All–American Girls Professional Baseball League. She recalled going with a friend to a tryout in Alexandria, Va.

"I knew we were good, and I imagine they knew we were good, too," Johnson said. "They looked at us like we were crazy. What do you want?' They wouldn't even let us try out, and that's the same discrimination that some of the other black ballplayers had before Mr. Robinson broke the barrier.

"Oh, wow, it was pathetic that people would be that way. It was a tremendous letdown for me. I didn't have a Mr. Rickey behind me. If I had somebody to say, 'Hey, they deserve to play,' it might have been a different thing."

After being rejected by the women's league, Johnson played pickup games with men in Washington. Several years passed until the Clowns, who were on a road swing through the old Griffith Stadium in 1953, heard about Johnson and gave her a tryout.

"They were seeing a steady decline in the interest in the Negro leagues because most of the blue chip players had gone over to the majors," said Ray Doswell, curator of the Negro leagues museum in Kansas City. "The Indianapolis Clowns decided to bring on as a hopeful gate attraction a female player. The first one would be Toni Stone."

The second was Johnson, who earned the nickname "Peanut" because, as teammate Gordon Hopkins put it, "She maybe weighed 98 pounds wet."

Brought in to play a few innings per game, the women quickly proved their worth as all–around athletes. Johnson's entry in the Biographical Encyclopedia of the Negro Baseball Leagues says, "The little right–hander could throw as hard as any male pitcher." "Each one had ability," said Alan Pollock, whose father, Syd, owned the Clowns. "They were probably the best female players in the country. Each of them was good enough to help black baseball survive at that point."

Negro league records are scattered and incomplete, and any statistics from Johnson's time with the Clowns are gone forever. But there are memories, such as the time Johnson struck out Kansas City Monarchs third baseman Hank Bayliss, one of the best hitters of his day.

Johnson, Bailey rematch not likely

By Paul Newberry
Associated Press

ATLANTA — Contrary to what some think, Michael Johnson is not consumed by the idea of a rematch with Donovan Bailey. "I get asked about it all the time, but for me it's a non–issue," Johnson said yesterday during a stop to promote this summer's Goodwill Games in New York. "Once a race is over, it's done with, it's finished. You have to take the bad with the good." Johnson, the Olympic champion at 200 and 400 meters, and Bailey, the gold medalist in the 100, met last year in a made–for–TV, 150–meter match race in Toronto. The ballyhooed event failed to live up to expectations when Johnson pulled up injured about 70 meters into the race and Bailey streaked to an unsatisfying victory.

Now, representatives of the two sprinters are talking about a sequel in New York.

Johnson isn't against the proposal, which faces myriad problems before it actually becomes reality. But he felt as if he made a significant sacrifice to take part in last year's race and he's looking for more of a legitimate track event to stage any rematch. "I don't think about it daily and say to myself, 'I've got to do this again,'" he said. "I look at it just like I would any potential race. It's separate from what's happened in the past or anything like that. Certainly, if the Goodwill Games wants to put that on and if it works for me, I'll be there."

From Johnson's standpoint, that means there's no chance he'll race down a temporary track through Times Square, as has been suggested to hype the event.

"One of the mistakes last time was having it in SkyDome on a track that was just rubber laid out over concrete," Johnson said. "It had lumps and things like that. But that was something I felt like needed to happen for the good of the sport."

While he doesn't blame the track in Toronto for his injury, he's unwilling to risk it on another temporary layout.

"This thing would have to be done in a first–class manner. It would have to be done right," Johnson said. "It has to be on a regular track."

Harvey Schiller, the president of Turner Sports, which is bankrolling the Goodwill Games, said it would be easier from a logistical standpoint to hold a 150 at Mitchel Athletic Complex on Long Island, site of the other Goodwill track and field events. "You've got to talk about protecting the athlete," Schiller said. "The athletes don't want to race on anything of a temporary nature where they could be exposed (to injury)."

Schiller said there have been discussions about including other top sprinters in a special 150 race. Also scheduled to compete in the Goodwill Games is Ato Boldon, the world 200–meter champion who has run the 100 in 9.86 seconds, only .02 seconds off Bailey's world record from the Atlanta Olympics.

Baseball to play last regular season game

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

In an effort to finally determine the 1998 Beanpot champions, the Massachusetts baseball team and their opponents, the Harvard Crimson, have agreed to make today a combination regular season game and Beanpot finale. The original match was scheduled for April 23 at Fenway Park but was postponed to May 4 due to rain conditions. Unfortunately, it was expected to rain on Monday, so today the A-10 East Champions and last year's Ivy League champs will finally meet. The Minutemen stand at 15–3 in the Atlantic 10, their best conference showing in UMass history.

Since their first invitation to the tournament three years ago, the Minutemen have won the last two and hope to repeat again this year. In 1997, Scott Barnsby hurled the first no-hitter in Fenway Park since 1957 as UMass went on to level Harvard, 1–0.

This meeting poses to be the last regular season game at home for seniors Scott Barnsby, Jeff Puleri, Muchie Dagliere, Pete Gautreau and Matt Wolcott. UMass will head into the A-10 tournament as the top seed in the East this weekend in Boyertown, PA.

This senior class has carried the team to a current 140–50 record. All four years they won the A-10 Eastern Division crown and at least two A-10 Tournament crowns. In 1995, they advanced to the NCAA tournament for the first time since 1978 under coach Mike Stone. In 1996, they helped UMass win their first NCAA game since 1969, also posting an 18-game winning streak. The class of 1998 also helped win 40 games in one season for the first time in school history.

The Minutemen won 2 of 3 games versus St. Bonaventure this weekend and carry a 27–11 record. Junior Bill Cooke earned his seventh-consecutive complete game victory, improving to 8–1. Seth Kaplan was a mainstay at the plate, connecting for two hits in all three games. Junior captain Doug Clark hit two dingers as well. They will face off against the Crimson who were 29–10 as of yesterday. The results of yesterday's game with Northeastern were not available at press time.

Once the sight of the Beanpot Championships, Fenway Park is now a distant memory as two rain postponements have forced the final to be held today at Earl E. Lorden Field.

UMass beat Boston College 7–2 in the Beanpot semifinal on April 21. Barnsby threw eight innings, allowing the two runs as junior Rich Hartman retired the side in order. Harvard had defeated Northeastern to gain access to the championship.

The Crimson are an offensive force to be reckoned with as they hit a tidy .334 as a team. Senior captain David Forst sports a .405 batting average to top the club. Junior Jason Keck follows closely with a .389 average. But they don't possess a great deal of power as they hit only 15 homeruns compared with UMass who have belted over 30 dingers this season.

The ace of their staff is Garret Vail with a 4–2 record in nine appearances. The junior owns a 2.30 ERA with 30 strikeouts as his opponents bat a measly .199. Junior Donny Jamieson is 3–1 in eight attempts. He leads the team in K's with 36 as his ERA holds at 4.05. The pitching duties have been widely spread this season as four others have won at least 3 games.

The only two teams both have faced are the Huskies and Dayton. Massachusetts beat Northeastern 7–6 as the Crimson soundly spanked them 11–0. UMass also beat the Flyers 15–5 as Harvard fell to them, 10–5.

UMass repeats as tops in A–10 athletic division

Repeating its performance the past two years, the University of Massachusetts has captured the Hanes–Atlantic 10 Commissioner's Cup, which goes to the school that achieves the highest degree of athletic excellence. The winner is determined through the regular season as well as the A–10 tournament results.

UMass totaled 162.5 points to Virginia Tech's 153.5 points. Even though the Hokie men tallied 78 points, 15 more than the Minutemen, the Massachusetts women cleaned up with 99.5 points to Virginia Tech's 75.5 points. George Washington, Rhode Island, La Salle, Dayton, Temple, Xavier, St. Joseph's, Duquesne, St. Bonaventure and Fordham filled out the rest of the field.

The key to this year's success is attributed to the women's dominance in the conference which earned UMass the Women's Award. The Minutewomen claimed five titles including cross country, indoor track & field, soccer, rowing and softball. They also placed second in field hockey, basketball, tennis and outdoor track and field. The Massachusetts men's swimming & diving team were the lone UMass men's winners.

The VA Tech men stood atop the rest of their competition as the winners of the Men's Trophy. They won five titles in cross country, soccer, indoor and outdoor track & field and tennis. Their female counterparts captured tennis and outdoor track & field.

The Colonials ran a close third with 117.5 points overall. Their baseball team came in first during the regular season as did their women's basketball and women's gymnastics.

Defense drives UM women's lacrosse

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Staff

Last year, when high octane offensive women's lacrosse teams saw Massachusetts on their schedule, they licked their chops. In two straight games in the 1997 season against Yale and Temple, UMass gave up 20 and 25 goals respectively. In thirteen games last season, the Minutewomen let in a double-digit opposing score eight times, and allowed an average opposing point production of 11.46 goals per game.

Teams like Brown and Dartmouth would invite UMass to town as a tune-up game, as the Amherst squad could only put forth freshman Megan Haggerty in goal, who had a heart of gold, but had never played between the pipes.

Coming into this season, teams began licking their chops again, as the Minutewomen's best-known defensive threats, Michele Warrington and Kristen Hocker, had graduated, and, for the second straight year, Massachusetts had to rely on freshmen goaltenders — recruits Tara Durkin and Jen Nardi. Haggerty, who had begun to settle in by the end of the season, opted to leave the team to better her academics. High scorers Laura Korutz, Rebecca Minaker, Jen Bowen and Jen Herker would all be returning, but that would do little good against scores that reached the quarter century mark.

On paper, it seemed as though it would be another rough year for the Minutewomen, whose 6–7 record in 1997 was the first time since 1994 that the team pulled below the double-digit line in losses. In the three years before, UMass did not win a single game, going 0–8 in 1993, and not even fielding a team in 1991–92. During the 1989–90 seasons, the team began their recent slump by displaying 2–11 and 4–10 records, respectively, as they followed up a 7–7–1 and an ECAC birth.

Fans of the team probably crossed their fingers, hoping that Korutz and her offensive teammates would have enough energy to pull ahead in all of the assured shoot-outs that they'd be in come springtime.

The opponents were underestimating the Minutewomen, the stat-sheets were wrong, and the fans were praying in vain.

Guess what: the defense was a rock in 1998.

Only five opponents broke ten points this time around, and of them, only three were victorious over UMass. No team came close to the 20 goal point in a game with the Minutewomen. This year, the surprising audacity of the defensive unit stoned opposing offenses, as five teams failed to pass four points, including St. Joseph's, who only scored twice against UMass, and New Hampshire, who had hovered around the 20 point mark in games all season leading up to their matchup against Massachusetts.

Syracuse, the NCAA's top scoring team heading to Amherst on April 19, could not top a mere eight points in their slim victory against the hosting Minutewomen.

The freshmen goalies? Nardi started ten games and recorded a 6–5 record, while Durkin began the other four contests on the schedule to boast a 3–0 mark. Their combined .627 save percentage was significantly higher than Haggerty's .470, 1997's opposing total of .584, and most importantly, this year's opposing total of .543.

In fact, the defense as a whole stepped up to allow only 8.259 goals a game, a whole three points less than in '97 every time out. The loss of Warrington and Hocker was more than made up for by the emergence of sophomores Jessica Passanese and Melissa Miele, and freshman Denise Brey. Their outstanding play, combined with the steady leadership of senior captain Amy Leder and sophomore Lynne Young, made for not only a decent group, but a nearly impenetrable one.

"Our defense has been the key to the team, even the attackers are tackling back and playing defense," Young said. "That has been the making the games so close."

An opposing attack would need a tremendous stroke of luck to break through the perimeter stances of Brey, Passanese and Miele, all of whom are imposing presences at heights near six feet.

"I just have faith in my defense, and I know that they're going to do it," Nardi said. "They're going to give me a fighting chance to stop the ball."

Leder came into the season second on the team in ground balls, recording 64 in 1997, and Young, who led the Minutewomen in that category this year with 40, was coming off of a second-team Northeast All-America selection as a freshman. Including those two, nine UMass players picked up twenty or more grounders. That depth stretched to Nardi and sophomore Colleen Wales, who each contributed with 24. It is a commonly known fact that you cannot score if you don't have the ball, and UMass obtained 341 loose balls to the opposing total of 295.

The most reassuring side of the defensive effort of Massachusetts this season was perhaps that the offensive players were equally as disciplined at stopping their opponents from scoring.

Korutz added to her third straight team scoring title by leading UMass in ground balls in five contests, more than any of her teammates. Junior Melissa Anderson had a fantastic all-around year as well, scoring 14 goals and picking up 22 ground balls. Freshman Rachel Ingraffea gained possession for the Minutewomen offense with five games in which she led the team in draw control.

The tenacious and physical play of the defensive team was the crucial difference in nearly all of the squad's victories over the course of the year, while gaining fairly little attention. Without such grit and determination, the offensive output of 9.5 goals a game would not have stood up against such offensive powerhouses.

75 feared dead in Peruvian plane crash

LIMA, Peru (AP) — Rescuers battled sucking mud and heavy rain yesterday to pull 12 injured survivors from the wreckage of an Occidental Petroleum plane that crashed in the Amazon jungle and burst into flames with 87 people aboard.

The survivors — some of whom were seriously hurt — had to be carried three miles on litters because driving rain prevented their evacuation by helicopter.

Despite mud that swallowed some bodies, authorities held out hope that more survivors could be found among the dense grass and foliage. But they also declared the remaining 75 people missing and feared dead.

"We still have hope. There are so many places for the injured to be," said Jose Diaz, spokesman for Los Angeles-based Occidental Petroleum.

The Boeing 737, which Occidental chartered from the Peruvian air force to transport oil workers, plummeted into the swamp late Tuesday, three miles short of the airport at Andoas, an oil camp 650 miles north of Lima.

Most of the 79 passengers on the plane, including an American and a Venezuelan, were oil workers employed either by Occidental or local contractors.

Fearing for her life, woman shoots lover

WARRENTON, Va (AP) — The daughter of a wealthy arms merchant shot her abusive polo player boyfriend because she feared for her life, her lawyer said yesterday at the opening of her murder trial. But a prosecutor said the handsome Argentine with a ready smile was no threat to Susan Cummings when he died at the breakfast table, croissant crumbs still in his mouth.

No one disputes that Cummings shot Roberto Villegas four times the morning of Sept. 7. When she called 911 to report "a shot man," she also said Villegas tried to kill her.

"He was a man with a violent temper. If you crossed him, if you didn't do things his way, he reacted. He would try to intimidate you. He would try to back you down," said her lawyer, Blair Howard, in his opening statement.

Prosecutor Kevin Casey told the jury that evidence will show Villegas wasn't coming after Cummings with a knife when he was shot, as she claimed.

"The evidence will show, in fact, that he was sitting at the kitchen table, apparently eating breakfast," Casey said.

Prosecutors believe Ms. Cummings, 35, cut her own arm before police arrived at her mansion in Virginia horse country, planting a knife near Villegas' body.

SGA approves latest elections, 1998-99 budget

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

Elections were ratified for the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) last night and the budget was passed for next year.

Despite Chancellor of Elections Seth Presser stating the elections were fair procedurally, Senator Paul Ferro (Commuter At-Large) said some procedures created an unfair election.

"I think these elections procedurally were near perfect elections," Presser said.

"There are problems with these elections. Approximately 40 percent of the ballots were cast on machines. The results statistically were even. That's like a 1 percent difference. But on paper ballots it was two to one ratio [in favor of Shamapande]. I'm no math whiz but something about this is wrong to me," Ferro said.

One procedure among several cited by Ferro as unfair concerned acting president Peter Kilbourne carrying paper ballots. Only elections commissioners may handle ballots.

"Our acting president was seen holding a stack of ballots," Ferro said.

Presser said the ballots Kilbourne carried were not yet coded and numbered and so are not considered ballots.

"What Peter was holding was not ballots. They have to be color coded and numbered and the papers Peter was holding was not the ballots," Presser said.

Presser addressed a concern over the treasurer elected to the commuter area government.

"The final tally sheet had a discrepancy between the total votes on the sheet and the tally of votes for each candidate," Presser said, "There are treasurer candidates and there will be a re-count."

The senate also passed the budget act for the fiscal year 1998.

Some Registered Student Organizations (RSOs) came to the meeting to advise the senate not to pass the budget because they were not given the allocations they requested.

The Jewish Student Union (JSU) wanted $9,000 for next year. They were allocated $7,500.

Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee Seth Avakian said the reason the ISU was reduced in funding was because they had not used all of the money allocated to them in the past.

"There is a history of not spending all allocations. Out of $5,000 allocated only $2,000 were used," Avakian said.

Dan Friedman, a member of the JSU, said the lack of spending was due to a different group of people running the JSU than are currently running it.

Physics and astronomy welcomes Lowenthal

by Victoria Groves
Collegian Staff

James Lowenthal has recently joined the physics and astronomy department at the University of Massachusetts.

In the past, Lowenthal earned a bachelor's degree from Yale University and his Ph.D. from the University of Arizona. He held a joint postdoctoral research position at Johns Hopkins University and the NASA Space Telescope Science Institute in Baltimore, Md. He was also a Hubble Fellow at the University of California at Santa Cruz.

Lowenthal will be studying how galaxies are formed, in an effort to further explore how small clusters of stars are pulled together by gravity to create large clusters that eventually grow into present-day galaxies and galaxy clusters.

"The work that [Lowenthal] is doing is at the cutting edge of modern astronomy and can help deepen our understanding of how the Universe evolved," said John Donoghue, head of the physics and astronomy department.

Scientists estimate that there are 100 billion galaxies in the observable universe.

"Looking at distant galaxies is essentially like using a time machine... light takes a long time to get here; when we look at distant galaxies, we're looking at light that has been travelling for 12 to 13 billion years," Lowenthal said.

Using powerful technology like the Hubble Space Telescope, which orbits the Earth, Lowenthal and other astronomers are now able to determine the sizes, ages, and masses of these distant galaxies by analyzing their colors and spectra.

"If you hold your thumb up against the sky, your fingernail covers one million galaxies, each with 100 billion stars," Lowenthal said.

An alternate view of cluster formation includes the belief that huge masses of gas collected in the universe, collapsed under their own gravity, and fragmented into galaxies and stars.

Lawyer discusses Action

Schlictman talks about polluted water case

By Paul Hayes
Collegian Staff

In his third visit to the University of Massachusetts, Attorney Jan Schlictman discussed what he had learned from the Woburn civil case that nearly destroyed him, and how he is living its lessons now.

Schlictman is best known as the protagonist of author Jonathan Harr's novel A Civil Action, which recounts the case Schlictman took on behalf of several Woburn families whose children developed leukemia, a cancer of the blood, after being exposed to a polluted water supply.

After spending nearly 10 years and a small fortune trying to prove that the Woburn families were the victims of massive pollution by a Beatrice Foods subsidiary and the W.R. Grace company, the case cost Schlictman almost everything he had — including his legal practice, his apartment, his Porche and nearly his spirit.

"I had to give up my condo, clothes, car, credit, colleagues and career," Schlictman said. "After [the case] was done, I saw only desolation, there was nothing left."

In the time since the Woburn case Schlictman has reevaluated his approach to the law. He said the adversarial approach which litigation produced between the Woburn families and both Beatrice and Grace was counterproductive to the families search for truth.

"Litigation may be a tool to get the truth (of how the pollution occurred), but in Woburn we litigated for nine years and the problems were not dealt with," Schlictman said.

Before taking on the Woburn trial, Schlictman was a successful, rich lawyer who was just beginning to make a name for himself. He considered himself a warrior, who was going to take on dark and evil forces.

But it was this warrior mentality that led him to not want to compromise with the other sides in the Woburn case, which nearly led to the victims receiving no compensation at all.

"As lawyers, we think that if we make problems for the other side, we're helping our clients," Schlictman said. "But perhaps we should be trying to help the other side instead.

Schlictman said he now approaches cases as problems which must be solved, through cooperation and complete honesty among all sides involved.

"Companies [responsible for] pollution are afraid to tell their community the truth," Schlictman said. "We must set up a situation where they will have to speak the truth to get the respect of their community."

Schlictman said that 15 years ago he would have filed a lawsuit to resolve problems in Pittsfield, where General Electric is responsible for polluting the town's water supply.

Now, however, Schlictman said the best solution would be to bring all sides together, to make them sit with one another and deal openly and honestly with the problem at hand.

"If the responsible side acknowledges their fault, and both sides have an open discussion, then settlements generally occur," Schlictman said. "Former enemies shake hands and embrace."

People often ask Schlictman if he would have taken the Woburn case, after knowing what he knows now, to which he replies that he already has.

Schlictman is currently representing the community of

Bicycle safety encouraged through new laws

KEN MC DONALD / COLLEGIAN
The owners of these bicycles, which were found outside of the Campus Center, will have to adhere to more stringent cycling rules. Amherst police will be enforcing bike regulations to increase safety awareness to town residents.

By Jason Trenkle

The next time you decide to take a bicycle ride in downtown Amherst, be aware that you may be fined for disobeying riding laws.

The Amherst Police Department is enforcing bicycle regulations for the Amherst area in efforts to further increase the awareness of the public to bicycle safety.

These new laws, which apply to rollerbladers and skateboarders as well, are focused on educating individuals about safety issues.

"These regulations are more of an education than an enforcement because with more education, the less enforcing that has to be done and that's what we're focusing on achieving," bike officer Douglas Geary said.

Geary pointed out that minor offenses could result in a violation warning. A second offense might warrant a town fine, and subsequent offenses would result in the termination of an individual's bike riding priveleges.

An individual can currently be fined for acts such as failure to obey vehicular traffic laws, operating without a proper braking system, and failure to yield right of way to pedestrians. In the past, bikers have been fined $20 for riding against traffic or for riding on sidewalks prohibited to bikes.

In addition, the enforcements are geared towards encouraging bikers to access the bike path that runs from Northampton through Hadley and into Belchertown.

Bike officers patrol the bike path seven days a week from 8–3 a.m., in addition to specialized patrol officers directed to respond to issues relating to open container violations, vandalism, and noise complaints. These bike officers are additions to the Amherst police department, so over the years, the town will be seeing an increased police force.

A referendum has been raised to have the bike path extend from University Drive to UMass, so that students can easily travel at their convenience.

"We are pushing for an increased effort of individuals to travel by bike to ensure a safer environment and to focus on ending vehicle congestion over the parking garage controversy," Geary stated.

The bike regulation laws were written as town bi-laws so that other towns could easily incorporate and adopt them into their system. In the past, the need for bike safety in Amherst was raised by the death of an Amherst bicyclist disregarding traffic signals.

Already, with an evident increase in the number of bicyclists, skateboarders, and rollerskaters, Amherst police officers like Douglas Geary hope people alike will become educated on bike safety and regulation laws, so that they will bike with safety the next time they ride.

Mullins dinner offers "unique" experience

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Amherst dining commons will be closed this evening as UMass students will have the opportunity to experience a range of multi-national culture at the Touring America: A Culinary Celebration at the William D. Mullins Center from 4 p.m. to 7:30 p.m.

Presented by the UMass Dining Services, the event is put on yearly for students as a way of kicking off the end of the school year. In previous years, students have been presented with a barbecue, but the past few years they have experienced a "unique" culinary event.

The event is open to students who are on the meal plan. Guest passes, Five College exchange, and strip tickets will not be honored, and all students not on a meal plan, will not be admitted into the event without paying $12 dollars. The Hillel house and Butterfield dorm dining areas will remain open to students on those meal plans.

PVTA buses will be "specially" running to escort student to the Mullins Center from all areas on campus.

The range of entrees students will be able to experience include food from areas such as the Northeast, Midwest, South, West Coast, Mid-Atlantic, and a wide range of vegetarian foods. There will also be "sumptuous" deserts for students to sample. There will also be seating and access for handicap students.

With a swipe of the U-Card, students will be given nine wooden nickels and one red coin. The wooden nickels will be their ticket to buy the wide range of food. The food entrees that range nationwide are, at most, two tokens and are of large portions.

The red coin will be the ticket for the desert package which includes two cookies and a Friendly's dessert treat.

The evening is also packed with a wide range of entertainment consisting of such performers as mimes, jugglers, people on stilts and balloon sculpturers.

Touring America is predicted to be a large event. Consuming the entire arena and concourse of the Mullins Center, the event has been organized to suit the entire UMass body.

"This is one of the biggest events for us this year, and we're really looking forward to it," Diane Sutherland of the UMass Dining Services said.

Rep. Burton apologizes to GOP

Tapes of Hubbell's prison conversations released, anger many

By Larry Margasak
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Stung by missteps, the chairman of the House fund-raising inquiry apologized to GOP colleagues yesterday for the furor over his release of tapes of Webster Hubbell's prison conversations. His top investigator departed, ordered fired by House Speaker Newt Gingrich.

Capitalizing on the Republicans' embarrassment, President Clinton deplored the selective release last week of portions of the taped prison conversations between Hubbell, his friend and former associate attorney general, and Hubbell's wife.

"I think it was clearly a violation of his privacy," the president said. "I believe that virtually everyone in America believes it was wrong to release selected portions of the tapes, apparently to create a false impression of what the whole record indicated."

Rep. Dan Burton, chairman of the Government Reform and Oversight Committee, said in his letter to colleagues: "Although the vast majority of the (Hubbell) material was completely accurate, some mistakes and omissions were made."

"I take responsibility for those mistakes," the Indiana Republican said.

Burton, himself facing Democratic calls to resign, sought to mitigate the damage as he allowed his chief investigator, David Bossie, to write a resignation letter rather than fire him outright as Gingrich had ordered.

House Republican sources, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Burton had sided with Bossie, a longtime Clinton antagonist, in a furious internal committee dispute last week over whether to release Hubbell's conversations. Bossie was in favor of the release.

Burton's committee eventually released edited transcripts of the conversations — some missing exculpatory comments by Hubbell — and touched off a public uproar that finally left Republican leaders demanding Bossie's removal.

At one point Tuesday night, Gingrich called Burton and demanded to know why Bossie hadn't yet been fired, according to the GOP sources. Burton, who argued on Bossie's behalf, replied the investigator would resign, they said.

Burton told reporters yesterday that Bossie had "chosen to resign." But Gingrich offered a different version: Burton "fired the one person he should have fired."

Bossie's departure wasn't enough. Burton also wrote a "Dear Colleagues" letter to his fellow House Republicans apologizing for the fresh controversy.

"I am sickened by the thought that anyone would think that I would purposefully release anything less than completely accurate information," he added.

Bossie was unrepentent in his resignation letter, blaming the uproar on Democrats subjecting Burton "to never-ending and unjustified attacks" while the White House stonewalled and "mischaracterized the editing" of the tapes.

"I want to emphasize that no one on the staff ever intentionally left anything out," Bossie said.

Congressional Democrats said Burton himself, and not his aide, was the problem. "In throwing David Bossie to the wolves, Speaker Gingrich is trying to evade any responsibility for the Burton tapes travesty," Democratic leader Dick Gephardt of Missouri said in a written statement.

He said he would seek a vote on the House floor today to remove Burton from participation in the inquiry, a move likely to fail in the GOP-run House.

Several GOP sources said the issue of the Hubbell tapes had come up at a closed-door meeting of the GOP rank and file yesterday. One source, who spoke on condition of anonymity, quoted Gingrich as saying everyone was embarrassed over the handling of the tapes and he was certain Burton was embarrassed as well.

At that point, Burton spoke up, saying he wasn't embarrassed. "Well, you should be embarrassed," Gingrich retorted.

The Honor Society of Phi Kappa Phi

The Provost of the University of Massachusetts, Dr. Cora B. Marrett, and the Phi Kappa Phi Chapter of this University are proud to announce the following new members invited from the Junior and Senior classes as well as the Graduate School and approved by the Chapter in accordance with the bylaws of the National Society.

Phi Kappa Phi was founded in 1897 at the University of Maine and was originally named The Morrill Society, in honor of the sponsor of the Congressional Act which provided for land-grant colleges and universities. In 1900 it was transformed into a national society by the Presidents of the University of Maine, the University of Tennessee, and Pennsylvania State University. The next chapter to join was the University of Massachusetts at Amherst, which remains the fourth-oldest chapter in the United States. The society was renamed Phi Kappa Phi in 1900, from the initial letters of the Greek words forming its adopted motto: Philosopia Drateito Photon, "Let the Love of Learning Rule Mankind."

To be eligible for membership, Juniors must have a GPA of 3.70 and Senior a GPA of 3.80. Only two Graduate students per program are nominated by their Graduate Directors.

The Phi Kappa Phi Initiation Ceremony will be held in the University Rhododendron Garden, Below the Chancellor's Residence, at 11:00 a.m. on Sunday, May 17th, 1998. Initiates are invited to bring family members and friends. (In case of rain the ceremony will be held in Bartlett Auditorium.)

Williams wins first place in Annual Math Competition

By Laura Jakutowicz
Collegian Staff

An awards ceremony was held yesterday in the math lounge of the Lederle Graduate Research Tower for the winners of the 13th Annual Math Competition.

Steven Williams, a math major, won first place with an award of $1,600. Joseph Daverin, a math and computer science major tied with Kevin Blanding, a computer systems engineering major, for second place. Each were awarded $700.

Three honorable mention prizes were awarded to Ryan Duvally, a physics major, Kevin Labonte, a computer science major, and Fred Squires, an electrical engineering major. Each of the three students won $100 for their efforts.

Over 61 participants competed for math supremacy in the department's challenge. The competition took place April 15 in rooms 101 and 103 of the Lederle Graduate Research Tower. The students were required to answer an exam consisting of 10 questions. Only open to freshman and sophomore students, the exam ranged in difficulty from the high school pre-calculus level to the first year and a half semester of college calculus.

The monies for the event were provided by SABIS, a private, non-profit management company that develops and operates high standard primary and secondary college preparatory schools.

Another company, EDS, which stands for Electronic Data Systems, was also involved with sponsoring the competition.

"The companies who sponsor this do some talking to the students and find out who they are" said Professor Henry Jacob, coordinator of the event. "Anybody who wins a prize in this event, even in the honorable mention, shows unusual math skills," Jacobs said.

Professor Iacobs said of Williams, first place winner of the event, "I don't think I've ever seen anyone do that well on the test."

The 10 exam questions were made up by retired University of Massachusetts professors Henry Jacobs, Eleanor Killan and Hascal Cohen.

The three professors were present for the exam, Jacob said.

"We were all there, proctoring and answering any questions" said Jacob. "The competition was only open to degree students enrolled at UMass-Amherst," said Jacob.

"The ISU has undergone a revolution. Our attendance at meetings has tripled with the new board [in charge]," Friedman said.

Friedman felt because Jewish students make up 17 percent of the population the ISU should receive 17 percent of funding.

"Asian, Latino, African, Native American Affairs get half the budget," Friedman said. " But we receive less than 1 percent of the budget with a population of 17 percent."

Members from the Phi Sigma Alpha service fraternity and the Center for Student Businesses also spoke to the senate concerning their allocations.

Registered Student Organizations can also petition the Finance Committee in the fall for up to $750 or go before the senate to petition for more than that amount.

Avakian announced funding for Spring Concert.

"This year I'm proud to say we allowed $100,000 to Spring Concert. This will ensure we have a Spring Concert next year," Avakian said.

Avakian explained the budget to the senate, addressing the concerns of some RSOs that it was unfair to them.

"Our committee has gone over every budget with a fine tooth comb. We put in the effort and we've treated each group equally. I'm asking you to trust us. I don't agree with every number but a budget is a compromise. Everyone in our committee didn't agree on every number but they agreed to the budget as a whole," Avakian said.

The senate voted to pass the budget with one "nay" vote.

The senate also passed a motion that will post bus schedules in all on-campus bus shelters.

Charities directors' salaries under fire

By Jonathan D. Salant
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Some officials at charitable AIDS organizations are doing well by doing good. At least nine groups pay their top officers more than $100,000.

And that has upset both AIDS activists and at least one member of the House, who spoke out yesterday.

"I was shocked to discover how many AIDS organizations pay their executives excessive salaries at the expense of those living with HIV," said Rep. Tom Coburn (R-Okla.) a physician who has treated patients with the virus that causes AIDS. "At a time when direct services and medically necessary care is being severely curtailed, many AIDS charity executives have put lining their own pockets above saving many lives."

The president of the board of directors of Washington's Whitman-Walker Clinic insisted the salaries are not out of line. Whitman-Walker's executive director, Jim Graham, was paid $143,690 in 1996.

"This is a salary that's nowhere out of sync with everything else," board president Dace Stone said.

In New York, the National Charities Information Bureau, which tracks charitable organizations, noted a lack of guidelines about how much a charity should pay its leaders. "It is up to the board of directors to figure out how much compensation it takes to improve or maintain the organization's revenues, and more importantly, their programs," bureau spokesman Dan Langan said. Directors of the nine AIDS organizations, which receive $53 million a year from federal, state and local governments, are in charge of operations, budgets and staff.

At the top of the list: Jerome Radwin, chief executive officer of the New York-based American Foundation for AIDS Research, a national group known as AmFAR. He was paid $191,729 in 1996, the group said in its financial disclosure form filed with the Internal Revenue Service.

Radwin said AmFAR brought in an outside firm to recommend salaries under a philosophy of hiring good people and paying them "not at the top but in a competitive framework to attract the talent we need."

Is our grading system valid?

In the next 10 days, I have two tests, one is 40 percent of my grade, one is one–third of my grade. I have three research papers due, all of which will be at least 10 pages in length, and all of which will also account for substantial portions of my final grades in those classes. All in the next 10 days.

If I choose to slack off at all in these final 10 days of the semester, a semester which is made up of weeks and weeks of days, not just these final 10, it's not likely that I'll be able to pass these classes, making it unlikely that I'll be able to count those credits towards graduating, making graduating on time unlikely, making a good grade point average unlikely, making a good resume unlikely, making getting a good job unlikely, making the idea of making money unlikely, making having a good life unlikely. All of this in just 10 days. Does this sound familiar?

"The people who usually are rewarded the most highly are often the most conformist, the most unquestioning and the most kiss–ass."

Joe Sullivan

Each year, all of our future hopes are thrust upon the final weeks of the semester, creating an amplification of what may be described as test anxiety: unwanted stress over the need to do well on exams or papers because we are told they hold a lot of weight in what the resulting semester grade will be, affecting what our future may hold. This horrible feeling increases as the amount of work increases. But there are two major ironies to this phenomenon of unease.

First, we don't even realize it, but we are paying exorbitant amounts of money, many of us, to be made to feel distressed over the work we are forced to do and be evaluated on at the end of and throughout each semester. We pay tuition and fees at this University which pay the salaries of the administration that makes policies which are passed down to faculty, again, paid by us, who use these guidelines to evaluate us on our performances.

Feeling stressed over getting good grades is due to the fact that we pay the administration and the faculty to evaluate us via the grading system. We facilitate the process without questioning the fact that we are caused to experience distress through the evaluation process. We just accept the fact that grades are the standard, and experiencing anxiety over them is normal. In fact, this is a form of oppression.

The second irony which I think we all agree upon nominally but never really truly believe is: "grades don't matter."

Grading is a means of evaluation. Of what though? Grading evaluates how well a student sacrifices his or her individual beliefs and succumbs to the whims of the all– mighty grader, thus succumbing to the all–mighty system.

I agree that hard work is good and deserves to be rewarded, but how often does the grading system do this? From what I've seen during my educational career, rarely. The people who usually are rewarded the most highly are often the most conformist, the most unquestioning and the most kiss–ass. This is the type of behavior the grading system rewards — it's political. It has nothing to do with the intellectual capability of the individual.

So we pay for test anxiety and the maintenance of the evaluation system that manifests it. What can be done?

There are several private progressive educational institutions in this country which seem to have a means for dealing with text anxiety by choosing to eliminate the grading system and enact a form of evaluation that does not rely on the praise of some, the relegation of others and the oppression of all. Hampshire College here in Amherst and Sarah Lawrence in New York are examples of these progressive schools.

Test anxiety, however, continues to be an institution of the majority.

I can't really say anything more on this. I'm freaking out over this paper I've got to write.

Letters to the Editor

GEO agency fee should be uniform

To the Editor:

I'd like to take a moment to clarify the nature of my recently publicized disagreement with the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO). Some people seem to have misunderstood and are under the impression that I simply feel it is unfair that I am being forced to contribute to GEO. This is not my position. What I do feel is unfair can be illustrated by the following hypothetical situation:

Student A works in a commercially desirable field and is living on a stipend of $24,000 while raising two children. Student A does not feel a need for a union's advocacy because her field is quite competitive and she is confident that her skills and exemplary record give her the leverage to advocate for herself.

Student B is working in a field with less commercial application and is struggling to survive on a $7,500 stipend with his two children. He is happy when GEO negotiates a new minimum stipend of $10,600. He has seen a tangible benefit of GEO advocacy and is glad to be a dues-paying member of the union.

With the new Agency fee student A pays $480.00 per year and receives no benefit from GEO advocacy that she couldn't have demanded on the strength of her own merit. Student B pays $206.00, and feels he got his money's worth because GEO just got him a raise.

What I feel is unfair is not that GEO is being supported by student A's money but that she is paying more than twice as much as student B, and receiving no benefit whatsoever that she could not have gotten for herself. The agency fee should be equal across the board, not a percentage.

I would be grateful to Mahmood Ketabchi or Jennifer Fasulo (Letter to the Editor, 4/15) if they could explain to me why I'm wrong in finding this an injustice. But in the meantime my lawsuit is proceeding (thank you to all who sent messages supporting the lawsuit, your influence has been important) and I don't think I'm being unreasonable in pursuing it.

To the Editor:

I have read the Collegian almost everyday since I arrived at UMass. I never stopped to consider that what I was reading might contain the wrong information. I suppose that it was naive of me to think this way.

My opinion of the Collegian changed when I read the paper on Monday, April 24. I was completely appalled when I read the article, "Service Memorializes Holocaust." It isn't that Morgan Tobor didn't write it well, it's just that information that was very important was left out as if it didn't matter.

Maybe my opinion is biased because I was part of the service. Yet, the committee I was on wasn't even mentioned anywhere in the article. We had co–sponsored it with the Baker, Chadbourne, and Greenough residential area, and they are the only ones who received any credit for it.

I would understand if it wasn't a well–known fact, but the duel sponsorship wasn't something that could be easily missed. It was mentioned several times throughout the service, was on the program and was on the flyers.

So, as part of those that were excluded, I would like to recognize those on Hillel/Jewish Student Union (JSU)'s Holocaust Commemorative Committee who worked hard in coordinating the service.

The old man and the tree

One day the other week, I was hurrying to the library (it wasn't for cyberporn, swear to God), when an older man caught my eye. He was looking at the Japanese Elm tree that stands outside of South College, in particular, the plaque that accompanies it. Clutching his umbrella and a stack of papers and books, he took in the information on that plaque, smiling slightly. After reading the whole of the text, he looked up, taking in the whole of the tree. He continued to smile, obviously appreciating the tree now that he knew even more about it. After a little while, satisfied, he moved on.

Mike Messaros

I have never really read that plaque. Not in my three full years at this school.

It amazes me that this gentleman struck me so thoroughly, but it made me reflect for a moment. Such a quiet, stirring moment in the crossfire of the University of Massachusetts is a rare thing, and subtle.

And it's those little things that fly by, the things you take advantage of too late to appreciate them, that makes one's stay a little bittersweet.

I tend to hate this school. I get angry at the policies, the people, the administration. I get tired of living cooped up in a dorm room, of staring at the patchwork ugly campus (especially the neo–Soviet poured concrete of the Fine Arts Center). It's sad that the only thing I get worked up about is the guy who made the funny noises on the Police Academy movies ("Is that your phone? Wait a minute..."). It's too easy for me to put this school down, and I may do it too often.

But, as Milton said in Paradise Lost, "The mind is its own place and in itself / Can make a heaven of hell, a hell of heaven." My mom tells me the same thing. And watching this older gentleman, I realized the power of rising above the situation, just by enjoying the little things. Something about stopping and smelling the roses comes to mind, but I'm not one for cliches.

This man wanted to enjoy that tree for a moment and he did. He didn't have to rush to the library to research a fast approaching project or write another paper.

I can appreciate the fact that this man didn't have to deal with the everyday push and pull of this University's politics. He didn't have to worry about the stupid Student Government Association elections or police procedures on Hobart Lane. He didn't have to get angry at the kids who blast techno from across the hall, or the ones below me who blast the bass so loud that I can feel it in my feet. I wish I could be the same way, but I feel myself so inextricably connected to every little tremor that pulses through this campus. And every little thing gets me closer to that inevitable ulcer.

For him, it was the tree and him. That's all for that single moment. I don't want to get silly, or transcendental here, but it must have been nice for him.

Sometimes, when I can get to my car, and I'm not worried about some non–existent parking ticket that parking services has foisted upon me yet again, I drive out to Puffer's Pond, listen to the waterfall, and look at the water. But even then I'm thinking, "Do I have anything due for that stupid English class? Was that girl looking at me for good reasons or because I had a 'kick me' sign on my back?" I can't even relax at moments like that.

I would like to find the little things around here that are special, that are true to the valley. There's some dinosaur park out by Hampshire that I've never seen. It could be like Jurassic Park out there and I don't even know about it! There is a huge bike trail that runs for miles along here, and I've never once set foot on it. I've let these little opportunities slip by as my college career slowly dwindles away.

What I want to do next year is not care. SGA screwed up again? Super! Parking tickets? Hey, whatever, dude. I'm going to go down to the campus pond and when the scum parts, I'm going to look for catfish. Now, that would be great.

I say that now, but I know that next year I'm going to spend another year in my room, playing NHL '98.

How long is it going to be until I can be that man, enjoying the simple sight of a large tree, the largest Japanese Elm in Massachusetts, or something like that. I wouldn't know, though, since I haven't read the plaque.

Thanks, and goodnight

These could be the best days of our lives...
But I don't think we've been living very wise..
Oh, no, no, no...

Oasis, "Digsy's Diner"

There, I quoted one of my favorite songs. And when you start doing that, you know it's time to leave. (I guarantee Housemate A says "Why'd you quote that song at the top? That was stupid," as soon as I get home).

Luke Meredith

Well, this is it. After about 50 columns, one every Thursday, (except for my one semester stay on Wednesdays you already forgot about), I will write no longer in this slot. We do have next week, but those are senior columns, so they don't really count. (That's just when you thank your buddies and what not, and whine about how much you'll miss UMass).

You know, stuff like that.

I've been writing columns for two years, and I've never really taken the time to thank all the people out there who have been loyal fans. I just want you to know that I'm not a jerk who thinks I'm better than you just because I wrote a few funny columns.

Well, I do, but I don't want you to think that. Then nobody would like me.

Ha, ha, just kidding.

If you don't mind, I have to get serious for a bit. (I guess there's a first time for everything).

I just wanted to use my final chunk of space to thank all the people who have supported me over the last two years. I always felt bad when people would come up and say good things about the column, and I would sort of stare at my feet and try to smile and say what I always said, "Thanks, I do what I can."

I always felt bad, because even if it got a little old after a while, I tried to never forget just how cool it was that writing about my friends, my concerns, my favorite songs, basically my little life, made me a celebrity on this campus. I wasn't Ernest Hemingway or anything, but I was writing what I wanted, and people liked it.

I don't know if I'll ever enjoy anything I'll do in this world as much as I've enjoyed writing the column for the last two years. And for everyone who is a fan, or maybe even laughs just once in a while, you've helped to make this the best two years of my life. For that, I owe you everything.

For all the people that thought I was a waste of space the last two years, that I was "funny not because I'm a good writer, but because I'm stupid," as one letter to the editor said, I have this to say. It may not have seemed like I had an ulterior motive, or that I put any thought behind what I wrote, but I did, and if you thought I was just writing what came off the top of my head, well you're only half right.

I did have a plan, you know. (What it was, though, is still up for debate). And, since you never liked me before, I'm not going to tell you what it was.

I don't have much time left, so I want to thank the people who deserve it while I'm still around. Thanks to the PVTA driver who told me I brighten up his Thursdays, and my ex– roommate's little brother who was so happy to meet me that he didn't mind that I sat on his lamp (long story). Thanks to the girls who set up the "We Love Luke" website (don't ask), and the kid who wrote asking for the U2 poster when I did, in fact, "kick it."

Thanks to the three people who wrote letters defending me when some racist bonehead threw a few cheapshots at me in the middle of a letter. Thanks to all the people who have cut my articles out and have either kept them or sent them to friends or family (you can't buy that kind of free syndication). And even if you didn't do anything, thanks anyway.

And to all my friends and anyone I didn't mention, stop crying. You'll all get the love you deserve in the senior column.

About a year ago, a girl at Time–Out asked me what it was like to be famous. I wrote it in a column once and said I didn't know. But now that it's over, I think I have an answer.

It was a pretty fun ride, and I'll never forget it. And if you meet me in 20 years and you want to tell me you liked reading my stuff way back when in the Collegian, you can go ahead.

It's the least I can do.

HOW TO SUCCEED IN BUSINESS

The People's Market

From the crates of red delicious apples to the stacks of Celestial Seasonings Tea, the People's Market offers students a variety of snack foods from bagels to cheese, coffee to juice and other natural products.

According to Laura Slotnick, a freshman theater major who is in her second semester at People's Market, the store's main products are coffee and bagels.

"Mainly, we're trying to get people who just grab and eat," Slotnick said. "It's just quick. You grab your bagel, you grab your cream cheese and you put it together."

According to Slotnick, People's Market was started 25 years ago by a group of seven women, who focused on selling mostly bulk items such as rice and beans.

"They were really going out on a limb," Slotnick said. "There weren't any other student businesses around [at that time], there wasn't any Center for Student Businesses. They were just doing it."

These days, People's Market is in plenty of company with other student-run businesses and like those other businesses, People's Market is a collective effort.

"There are 25 of us who are all managers," Slotnick said. "We have these committees and there is an overall committee, it's called the core committee. They are supposed to look at the Market as a whole."

Last spring, privatization on campus concerned the UMass community, especially in the way that privatization would affect the student-run businesses. Slotnick said that privatization is not as big of an issue now.

"It's an issue, but if you talk to the people who are doing [Student Union 2000], their plans are all revolving around us being here," Slotnick said.

People's Market offers a flexibility that is difficult to find other businesses.

"In other businesses, you do the same thing over and over again," Slotnick said. "With this you've got to be creative. You always have to be on your toes because there is no one keeping an eye [on you]."

People's Market is located at 328 Student Union. Hours are 8:45 a.m.–5 p.m. Tuesday through Thursday and 8:45 a.m.–4 p.m. Mondays and Wednesday. For more information, call People's Market at 545-2060.

Campus Design and Copy

With resumé in hand, it's time to find a place to get the darn thing printed. You could try Kinko's or Copy Cat but for convenience sake, you just may try the student-operated Campus Design and Copy (CD&C), located in the Student Union.

"We offer design and copy services [and] resumé services," said Ian Levesque, a junior journalism and English major, who has worked for CD&C for a year and a half.

According to Levesque, CD&C is a collective, non-profit organization with 15 employees.

CD&C's main clientele are drawn from the University of Massachusetts community.

"Our clients are usually RSOs. Even the other businesses will come to us to get their copying done," Levesque said. "Most of our business comes from the academic packets we sell, so we make a fair percentage of our profits in the first part of the semester."

Does CD&C worry about places like Copy Cat or Kinko's?

"We don't really worry about them, but we look to them to see what's getting them a lot of the business that we're not getting," Levesque said. "We see that they're doing something a certain way and we try to see how we can improve our services."

Levesque also says that businesses like Copy Cat and Kinko's don't necessarily offer direct competition because students prefer to frequent a student-run business which is conveniently located on campus and also students prefer CD&C's lower prices.

According to Levesque, CD&C is also looking into establishing communications with another copier, Collective Copies, located in downtown Amherst. Like CD&C, Collective Copies is a collectively operated business.

"We're looking to each other to see how each of us is running our business and how we can relate to each other," Levesque said.

Campus Design & Copy is located in 401 Student Union. For hours and more information, call 545-2271.

Sweets 'n More

The aroma of freshly baked brownies wafts through the lounge of the Field Residence Hall, as residents crowd into the Sweets 'n More snackbar. Serving up treats for the often-hungry college student on study break, Sweets 'n More's menu includes cookies, brownies, Rice Krispie Treats, Italian ice, grilled-cheese sandwiches, bagels and more.

Jessica Maravel Piccolo, a sophomore music major, has worked behind the counter at Sweets for four semesters and says that the experience of working at a student-run business turned out to be much different than what she expected.

"When I first worked there, I thought it was just going to be a behind the counter job and it turned out we have to do everything. We have to buy the food, order the food, do the books," Maravel Piccolo said. "It's basically running a business."

In addition, Sweets' employees are also responsible for advertising, payroll, the upkeep of the store as well as meeting inspection guidelines set by the University of Massachusetts' Department of Environmental Health and Safety.

Like other student-run businesses, Sweets does not have a direct supervisor; rather they govern themselves.

Maravel Piccolo said that the employees at Sweets meet once a week for an hour and a half to make major decisions.

"At Sweets, we all [make decisions] because we are a co- op and we all have an equal voice," she said.

Maravel Piccolo says that one of the most difficult aspects of working for Sweets is the scheduling of the different shifts around classes and other activities.

"It's scheduling weekly all-staff [meetings]. People have classes at night, during the day. Weekends are no good because people go home," Maravel Piccolo said. "It's getting all of us in the same place. And there are only eight of us. Sylan [Snackbar] has like 16 [employees]. I don't know how they do it."

Maravel Piccolo works five hours a week behind the counter, but she also spends a couple hours a month working with the advertising committee in addition to the weekly all staff meetings.

Maravel Piccolo also points out that running a business involves keeping an eye on every little detail.

"If something breaks and it's my turn to go to the cluster office to [fill out] a report and I forget to do it, then that causes problems," Maravel Piccolo said.

But working at Sweets has definitely been a good experience for Maravel Piccolo.

"It's nice to know how to run a business, even though I'm a music ed major," Maravel Piccolo said. "It has nothing to do with my career path, but now I have better perspective [on how to run a business]."

Sweets is open Sunday through Thursday 8 p.m.–12:30 a.m. The Field Residence Hall is located in Orchard Hill

Earthfoods

It's lunchtime and Earthfoods, a non-profit vegetarian cafe located in the Student Union, is open for business. The aroma of the day's menu hangs in the air, as customers find seats at the tables or get their food.

Sharon Wagner, who has worked at Earthfoods for a year, says the cafe's mission "is to provide vegetarian and cheap food for the students. Our primary goal is to make sure the students are getting what they want."

Like other student-run businesses on campus, Earthfoods is a cooperative business, which allows the employees to share an equal voice in the functions of the business.

"We're all equal in terms of responsibilities. We're all managers. There's no boss," said Wagner, a junior environmental science major and a member of Earthfoods' outreach committee.

Earthfoods' 27 members participate in 18 different committees which ultimately make the decisions on how Earthfoods will be run. According to Wagner, employees are elected every semester to the committees on which they serve.

The outreach committee, for example, is responsible for advertising, bringing in new people and making the atmosphere comfortable for customers.

According to Liz Karney, a junior social thought and political economy major, the committees hold weekly meetings to make decisions.

"We vote on different things, like events we're going to help out," Karney said.

From cooking to clean-up, the Earthfoods' employees are involved in every aspect of running the business.

"Students basically do everything," Wagner said. "We work seven to seven, Monday through Friday."

And because of the cooperative nature of the business, the schedule allows for flexibility in duties.

"The time you have available to come dictates what you're going to do. If you come in at seven [in the morning], you cook the entreé or the soup. It's never predetermined," Karney said. "You just decide, whoever feels like doing what. It's pretty much like that all day."

Like other student-run businesses, Earthfoods inspires a passion from its employees.

"It's interesting because I'm used to having a job where you go to work, then you leave work and then work is done. This place occupies my thoughts all the time," Karney said. "There's something about working on a collective level and with people instead of for people or having people work for me."

Earthfoods is open from 11 a.m.–3 p.m. Monday through Friday.

The Bicycle Co-Op

After sitting idle for the winter, it's time to send those bicycles for a tune-up and what better place to go then to the Bicycle Co-Op, a cooperative business located in the Student Union?

"We provide students and the community with a low-cost alternative for bike repair and bicycle parts," said Brandon Gillard, a junior animal science major and an employee of the Bike Co-Op. "We do everything, mostly tune-ups and we sell lots of parts."

Along with fixing bicycles and selling the relevant accessories, the Bike Co-Op also participates in community service activities, such as trail clean-ups and a "Bike to Campus Day."

The Bike Co-Op employs 12 students, almost all of whom are shop-trained mechanics. According to Gillard, there are certifications available for those who work professionally as part of a team, but most shop mechanics are not certified. But for those who lack experience in bike mechanics, the Bike Co-Op offers the perfect environment to learn the ins and outs of bike repair.

"You can learn [here]. We have volunteers who aren't paid who just [come] to learn, have a good time and work with customers," Gillard said. "Eventually they become mechanics. That's how I started. Now I'm running a bike shop."

Gillard, who manages a bicycle store in Kennebunkport, Maine, says that many of the Bike Co-Op's employees also work at area bike shops.

"They don't really like us working here," Gillard said of the local bicycle vendors. "It's because we're direct competition for them."

Gillard feels that the Bike Co-Op offers substantial competition for many of the area bicycle sellers.

"Every dollar we make is a dollar out of their pockets. They think we're hacks, but we actually know what we're doing," Gillard said.

Gillard, who came to the University of Massachusetts with aspirations of becoming a veterinarian, now dreams of owning his own bicycle store.

"I'm using my animal science degree as a back-up now," Gillard said. "This is an education in itself."

The Bicycle Co-Op is located at 319 Student Union. Call 545-0647 for hours, prices and more information.

Woody Allen meets Truffaut

Vanessa Redgrave stars in less than subtle & predictable film

By Emily Trask
Collegian Staff

DÉJÀ VU
Directed by Henry Jaglom
with Victoria Foyt, Stephen Dillane, Vanessa Redgrave
Playing at The Academy of Music

As the title indicates, Déjà Vu is about the strange phenomenon of feeling like you have met a complete stranger before or have been in a foreign place at some other time. The film portrays how these mysterious connections that strangers can feel toward one another can completely and suddenly send an otherwise orderly life into a tailspin.

The opening scene begins with Dana (Victoria Foyt), an American business woman, wandering the back streets of Jerusalem. The scene is set up to reflect Dana's inner turmoil and indecisiveness.

While contemplating life, in a cafe, she meets a mysterious older French woman (Aviva Marks) who weaves a tale of a war-torn romance. The only remnant of this passionate affair is a ruby brooch, which upon abruptly exiting the cafe, the woman leaves behind with Dana.

Compelled by this strange woman's tale of woe, Dana commits herself to finding the owner of the pin and flies to Paris, thus postponing her rendezvous with her fiance in London.

As her attempts are futile, Dana heads to London by way of the chunnel. Drawn in by the infamous white cliffs of Dover, Dana gets off the train, once again delaying her trip. While soaking up the grandeur of the cliffs, Dana finds herself inexplicably drawn to a familiar stranger named Sean (Stephan Dillane).

Caught up in the moment, Dana is tempted by this mysterious encounter, but soon is brought back to reality by the remembrance of her engagement to another man.

Dana flees to London and into the safety of her fiance's arms. In London, she meets the adventurous Skelly (Vanessa Redgrave), who, serving as her mentor, encourages the confused Dana to "jump off the cliff when the tide is in," or so to speak. Worried that what she feels is only an illusion, Skelly reassures Dana by saying "illusion is merely the scent of something real coming close."

On the other hand, Dana is also reminded that there can be consequences when following chance.

The fluctuation between the concepts of stability and chance permeate the entire atmosphere of the film. More like a documentary dealing with one of the most difficult choices in life, the sporadic camera work further emphasizes this constantly wavering tone.

While the beginning of the film showed much promise, as it progressed some of the themes were harped on a little too much, leaving the end predictable and unmoving. Had Déjà Vu been more subtle, it may have been more effective in getting its point across.

In light of the opening of their latest film, Lady Rachel Kempson Redgrave and her daughter Vanessa Redgrave took to the stage, together once again, at the Northampton Academy of Music on Monday evening, to introduce the film, in which they appear together, as they play out a moving but troubled mother\daughter relationship.

Massachusetts International Festival of the Arts (MIFA) Executive Artistic Director, Donald T. Sanders opened the screening by thanking the audience for their generous support and proclaiming the presence of the Redgraves as a "historic moment" for Northampton and for the Academy of Music.

As an academy award winner and probably one of the greatest actresses in the tradition of English speaking theater, Vanessa Redgrave has appeared in more than 70 films, in addition to an extraordinary stage career.

Redgrave's mother Lady Rachel Kempson has also enjoyed a long and distinguished career on stage and in film. In keeping with her noble standing, Kempson wished the theater and the audience the greatest fortune. "I hope that there are many many happy performances here!" exclaimed this jewel of British theater as she dramatically bestowed parting kisses upon the audience.

LES MISERABLES
Directed by Bille August with Liam Neeson, Geoffrey Rush, Claire Danes
Playing at Hampshire Mall Cinemas

Victor Hugo's classic novel of sacrifice, obsession and justice has been adapted to movie screens countless times already, not to mention into a musical version that is now large enough to eat Indiana. The obvious question is: Do we need another Les Miserables? Based on this version, the answer is maybe. But this isn't it.

The movie begins with promise, a long shot of an oddly oily river and then shots of a bleakly beautiful countryside. It's like living in a painting. But after that the landscape mostly vanishes and the movie descends and focuses on the main character... the bread thief/convict/mayor/father Valjean (Liam Neeson). The movie follows its characters at the expense of setting and social issues and reduces a layered novel into a soap opera with fancy clothes.

There is little to this adaption other than the bones of plot. Through an act of kindness, the convict Valjean comes into money and turns himself into a respectable member of society. Obsessive Inspector Javert (Geoffrey Rush) learns Valjean's true identity and attempts to arrest him. At the same time Valjean promises a dying woman (Uma Thurman) that he will care for her daughter, Cosette. Valjean escapes Javert, gathers Cosette, and escapes into Paris. Years later, Javert finds Valjean again, Cosette (Claire Danes) falls in love with a student radical, and a revolution starts. The loose ends are all tied, but any sense of satisfaction is mostly the result of the story, or familiarity with the novel or musical, and has very little to do with the construction of the movie itself.

The problem is that director Bille August doesn't seem to be interested in anything. The story is told without energy or attention to detail, settling for saying "and then this happened..." over and over. August's presentation and vision is as interest-

This Les Miserables would be completely paint–by– numbers if it were not for Liam Neeson, who very nearly rescues the movie from the slop heap. Geoffrey Rush is smooth and fine, but it is Neeson who carries the movie. Neeson possesses one of the most interesting noses in show business, which means there is always something to look at. Besides that, he completely inhabits Valjean, expressing deep guilt and obsessive, protective love without flailing about like a trout out of water. The same cannot be said for Uma Thurman and Claire Danes, both good actresses in full trout mode.

In particular, Danes' performance is disappointing. Her recent screen appearances have been uneven, considering the brilliance and restraint she showed on the small screen in TV's "My So–Called Life." Simply put, she needs to stop taking roles that require so much crying. Ms. Danes, we'd all like to see you happy for once.

The best summary of the movie is its characterization of the radical Marius, played by Hans Mattheson with all the revolutionary fervor of that guy from "Journey" crossed with a J–Crew shorts model. This is just one example of the movie trotting out characters and events it assumes are moving because they were moving in the novel. The movie is not moving on its own. The story is there, but only the story, none of the difficult–to–define soul. Adaptations of classics are fine, but they have to stand on their own, not act like a greatest hits package. What this movie lacks is the fire of art. C–

UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS AMHERST

Guild brings reality to SU Ballroom

By Seema Gangatirkar
Collegian Staff

A dose of reality hits the Student Union Ballroom this weekend as the UMass Theater Guild unveils its production of Angels in America, the Tony award winning play by Tony Kushner. The show opens tonight at 8 p.m.

Angels in America, which also won a Pulitzer Prize in 1993, is the first in a two–part series dealing with the realities of racism, anti–Semitism, homosexuality, homelessness, politics, Reaganomics and everyone's favorite topic — conspiracies.

"We don't shy away from anything at all," is how Ari Teplitz, the play's producer, describes the show.

Angels in America follows the lives of two couples. In one couple, the wife is addicted to valium while her husband is a closet homosexual. The second couple, Prior and Louis, are a gay couple whose lives are turned upside down when Prior is diagnosed with AIDS.

"This is the first play that really deals with AIDS," said Chris Budz, who plays Louis in the production. In talking about his character, Budz says that Louis is "not at a point where he can deal with himself and things that happening to him. He's always looking for a way to save himself."

The Theater Guild took a more creative approach to Angels in America under the guidance of director Michael Dziura and added interpretative dance sequences to enhance the storyline.

"It's not musical theater dance," Teplitz said. "It's not boy meets girl, boy kisses girl and then 40 people whom they've never met before come out and dance the exact same thing."

Rather Teplitz says that the dancers interpret the characters' feelings.

After rehearsing for Angels in America for eight weeks, Teplitz is pleased about the final result.

"Everyone in the [show] is very confident we can do justice to the show," Teplitz said.

But more importantly, Angels in America offers UMass a slice of America.

"A lot of plays censor what happens in real life," said Russ Rakouskas, who portrays Prior in the production. "This one opens eyes."

The Guild cautions audiences that because of the subject matter, Angels in America may not be appropriate for children under the age of 13.

"This play really makes you think," Budz said. "You're constantly processing what's going on."

Angels in America runs opens tonight and runs through Saturday. Evening shows are at 8 p.m. There will be a 2 p.m. matinee on Saturday. Tickets are $4 for students and $6 general admission.

ing and original as Cliff's Notes. As if to insist that the movie is emotional, the score is loud and operatic. The movie forgets that a small gesture of the hand or a carefully chosen detail can do the same work as a string orchestra. It's like the movie expects to make us weep, but doesn't actually feel like weeping.

A huge book like Les Miserables deserves to be a huge movie, but this adaption doesn't aim for either The English Patient's complex interplay of personal and epic or Braveheart's blunt, simple sweep. This Les Miserables is neither complicated nor powerful. The revolution is never more than a plot annoyance, neither Cosette or Valjean seem to care. Maybe they don't care because the battles scenes are about as frightening and real as an episode of Xena.

Celebrate Pearl St. reopening with Toots

By Adam Dlugacz
Collegian Staff

So you're sitting around wondering what to do on another Thursday night in the valley. Hopefully you will be going down to Pearl Street and skanking to the beats of reggae legends Toots and the Maytals.

After a brief period of dormancy and a change of ownership, Pearl Street Night Club in Northampton re–opens Pearl Street has consistently put on some of the better shows in the Valley and it will be good to have them back. To celebrate their grand re–opening, they have brought us the world famous Toots and the Maytals.

Toots and the Maytals began their illustrious career in Jamaica at the beginning of the reggae and ska movement. Along with contemporaries the Wailers and Burning Spear they would set the tone for decades to come. Toots' earlier material is firmly rooted in the seminal ska scene, and their impact can be clearly heard throughout the ska world today.

What separated the Maytals from the rest of the burgeoning scene was the voice of Toots. Often referred to as the Otis Redding of reggae, his beautiful vocals brought his listeners to ecstatic heights. While most of his contemporaries had a gruffer style Toots had a softer tone that was reminiscent of soul crooners rather then the natty dreads. It is his voice that cemented the Maytals into music history.

As the Maytals developed, their Season finales, Alyssa Milano & more

Tube Notes with Ryan Benharris

An entire season on any program can build itself up to a climatic point that could make or break its future. Some shows tend to use their last efforts to produce such a grand finish that it could quite possibly make up for any or all failed attempts to gain an audience during the season. Here's a look at what's heating up to become the highlights of this year's season finales.

Obviously the best finale that will take place one week from today, is the series finale of "Seinfeld." After almost a decade of Jerry and friends, the show finally says good–bye in a two–hour episode that will highlight episodes of the past. It will be an emotional farewell that has been hyped up so much that even the actors don't know how they are going to deal with the loss. It was just time to move on, and the world will have to soon learn to live a life without "Seinfeld."

The "Friends" season finale also claims to be huge. Tonight, the popular NBC sitcom travels to London to tape a wedding between Ross (David Schwimmer) and his British fiancé Emily. If you've ever watched one episode of "Friends," you obviously know who doesn't approve: Ross' old flame, and possible soul mate, Rachel (Jennifer Aniston). Two weeks ago, Rachel claimed that she would not attend the wedding because it would be "too hard for her."

After last week's episode involving Ross' bachelor party, there were scenes from next week's show that involved Rachel running out of her apartment telling fellow friend, Phoebe (Lisa Kudrow, who is not attending the wedding in London because she is pregnant on the show as well as in real life) saying that she "has to go to London to tell Ross that she loves him." "Friends" is heating up, and the season finale will be hotter than the show has ever been.

Another NBC sitcom will have a terrific season finale that comes equipped with high profile celebrities. The Emmy award winning "Mad About You" has an interesting plot that involves Paul (Paul Reiser) filming a documentary on the making of the billion–dollar grossing film, Titanic. It should be interesting to see what happens when Titanic producer and director James Cameron guest stars as well as Ellen DeGeneres.

Perhaps the most unique season finale belongs to one of the most unique shows on television. In case you have not heard, one of the most anticipated films of the summer is, X–Files: the Movie. The plot for the movie is going to be a continuation of the cliffhanger ending of the show's season finale.

The season finale will be a four–week long fiasco and the final episode of the four will be a cliffhanger ending that leads into the movie. "X–Files" star David Duchovny (Agent Mulder) has been quoted (or misquoted) about showing interest in leaving the show. He has been very demanding about location, and filming of the show, and if creator Chris Carter has had enough of his influence, he may choose to say goodbye to the actor. We all know that there is only one way that people leave "The X–Files," and the movie would be a perfect opportunity to get rid of him. However, I am not a huge "X–Files" fan, and this is based solely on opinion. Of course FOX would never allow material like that out into the open before it actually had a chance to happen.

Other season finales that are definitely worth watching include NBC's "Caroline in the City," ABC's "Spin City" and of course one of the best shows on television, "ER."

In other news, it's goodbye to "Ellen." ABC canceled the less than popular sitcom after horribly low ratings. "Ellen" only had one moment to shine in its four–year long run, and that was last year when she had the famous, "coming out episode" with guest star Laura Dern. Though Disney should be given credit for its very good attempt at bringing more diversity to television by having the first ever homosexual lead character, the show was not funny.

If a sitcom isn't funny, it doesn't stay on the air very long. Perhaps if they use the good ideas that were brought forth with "Ellen," ABC and Disney will be able to create a more successful show.

Norm McDonald made a complete fool of himself again. This past weekend, the former "Saturday Night Live" star planned a trip to Assumption College where he was to do stand up comedy. Unfortunately for Norm, he spent hours before the show kicking back a tad too much alcohol, and ended up too intoxicated to go on stage. When he actually appeared on stage, he was booed by practically everyone, and some people even pelted him with food, and other types of trash. It seems that some of these celebrities go on long kicks of bad behavior, and once started, they can't stop.

This past Tuesday night was filled with quality entertainment, if you missed it, WB aired its best two hours of television in a long time. Like every week, "Buffy the Vampire Slayer" and "Dawson's Creek." "Buffy the Vampire Slayer" was filled with quality action scenes and a very decent plot. However, the highlight of the night was when "Dawson's Creek" creator Kevin Williamson got a chance to show his true colors. Williamson is not only the writer of the popular TV drama, but he also wrote box office blockbusters Scream, Scream 2 and I Know What You Did Last Summer. Williamson wrote a script that was exactly like a mix of all three movies, and made the drama into a "who–done–it horror show."

It was nothing short of excellent, and after much advertising and hype, it proved to be worth the high ratings and reviews that it has been receiving.

Finally, everyone's favorite actress, Alyssa Milano of "Melrose Place" is finally doing something to defend her dignity. She's trying to stop pictures of herself in the nude being spread all over the Internet. After teaming up with her mother, Milano hopes to destroy all of the pictures that are helping to add to her bad reputation, and try to regain what was once considered a good face.

Mike Welch leaves room to grow

At 18-years-old, most people are winding down their high school careers wondering what to do. At 18, Mike Welch released his first blues album. Now 18, his third is on the way.

Welch debuted in 1996 with the highly praised, These Blues Are Mine, and then followed up with 1997's Axe To Grind, both recorded under his former stage name, Monster Mike Welch. On June 9, the Boston native releases his third effort, Catch Me (Tone Cool), self-produced and featuring Welch the songwriter — all but two of the tracks are his own.

The CD opens with what sounds like an imitation of something off the latest Rolling Stones album. As Good As Gone is disgustingly pure pop guitar, though the solos on this track do show signs of Welch's virtuosity as a blues guitar player.

Make Up Your Mind continues with the commercial sound, and gives more insight into Welch's lack of an original vocal style. His voice is from the raspy Stevie Ray Vaughn school, but it lacks the emotion Vaughn was capable of displaying.

Add the first two tracks to every other track on the CD that Welch sings on, and you basically have unconvincing singing, simplistic lyrics, and redundant pop riffs but good blues solos. Catch Me sounds like a '50's doo-wop rip-off, Changing Of The Guard sounds like Welch could be playing on a commercial for Minute Rice, and My Love Belongs To You, though Welch uses a different singing style, is completely sappy.

There is hope on this CD though. It comes in the form of instrumental tracks.

Mole's Blues is a guitar showcase that basically gives a workshop on how to play the blues, and it is not too far- fetched to say that Welch could be confused with Johnny Winter or even B.B. King on this one.

Worried Life Blues is a mellower display of Welch's talents than Mole's Blues, and it also seems to allow his own style to come through more. Blues For Cara is similar to Worried Life Blues in its quieter sound, but the guitar work is even gentler — very cool and sophisticated. Whoever Cara is, Welch is definitely inspired by her.

Mike Welch is young, and he has a long time to refine his skills and experiment with various styles and techniques. He has the potential to be a fine blues guitar player for a long time as long as he sticks to playing the blues, rather than wandering into pop or r&b.

Pamela Sneed shows power of poetry

By Anna Feder
Collegian Staff

PAMELA SNEED
Graduate Lounge
May 5

New York-based poet and performer Pamela Sneed had no problems projecting her voice in the Graduate Lounge Tuesday night, despite the absence of a microphone. The audience huddled closely around her for fear of missing some of the subtleties of her message, although there were few of those.

Armed with a copy of her first published collection of poems Imagine Being More Afraid of Freedom than Slavery, Sneed held the audience spellbound for what seemed too short a time. The book, which was published this year, is a summation of 10 years of writing and is available at Food For Thought, the sponsor of her performance.

Her work can best be described as a collage of feelings, experiences and raw sensation, stretched from her lips in vine-like branches occasionally touching a listener enough to giggle self-consciously or even murmur in concurrence. The austere tone of "Elegy" began the journey into her life and flowed with few interruptions to an abrupt end with her title poem.

Her social criticisms were less than palatable pleading to convince the audience that "It Is Not a New Age." She illustrated her arguments, "when a woman is dismembered, thrown thirty six stories, abortion clinics bombed social programs expendable... it is not a new age." The audience remained in silent reflection.

"Precious Crazy Girl Giggles" softened the blows of the harsher realism that characterized much of the performance. A delirious dream of "collard greens, bluefish, brown rice," the poem was a praise to the maternal and a celebration of girlhood innocence that isn't afforded in much of her work. The audience took a breath and smiled.

The evening ended with a brief question and answer period allowing for a further understanding of her craft and relationship to the material. She described her ideal audience.

"I get different responses from different audiences. I just want to know that they get it. I want to interact with human beings. I don't want to betray my identity but I want a wider audience."

Sneed deals with her identity as a black, lesbian, woman, revolutionary poet sometimes with rage at societies inequities and others with sweetness for being happy with who she is.

sound changed and began to incorporate more melody and harmony. In fact their later works brought together elements of soul and folk. However the Maytals were always firmly rooted in the reggae scene and there is no doubt that their sound is Jamaican. While their contemporaries like Peter Tosh, Bunny Wailer and the immortal Bob Marley used their music as a medium for their politics the Maytals preferred to keep things upbeat. The music does occasionally reveal political overtures but it is tempered by the beauty of Toots vocals.

Toots and the Maytals are the perfect spring time group and are great music for a celebration.

Toots and The Maytals will perform Pearl Street tonight. Doors open at 8:30 p.m. and tickets are $15 in advance.

Shelley Long stars in new series on WB

By Bob Thomas
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES —She'll be forever known as Diane Chambers, the over-qualified barmaid in "Cheers." But Shelley Long is taking on a new persona in a TV sitcom, "Kelly Kelly."

Starting with a trial run on the WB network Monday nights, the series may have a better chance than most sitcom startups. It boasts two stars with proven comedic talents: Long and Robert Hays, the terror-stricken pilot of Airplane! movies.

Long doesn't roam far from her "Cheers" profile in her new role as Kelly Novak, egghead professor of literature at an Ivy League school. Hays appears as Doug Kelly, widower with four children and fire chief who rescues her from a burning building. They fall in love, marry, and Miss Novak becomes Kelly Kelly.

A good talker, Long talks about her new venture over alight lunch in West Los Angeles. As she explains, "Kelly Kelly" started very innocently two years ago, with an invitation to talk about a series with Warner Bros. executives.

"I know how this works," Long said. "Any kind of development in Hollywood is usually lengthy and arduous and often unproductive. So you go into it with the attitude, 'Well, it's nice to make new friends and see what grows out of it.'

"I picked up right away that they wanted to do family shows, though they understood that I would want to bring something different and somewhat sophisticated to the show."

That interested her, especially after completing The Brady Bunch Movie and playing mothers in several TV movies of the week. And it mirrors her real life: She and husband Bruce Tyson have a 13-year-old daughter, Juliana.

To date, most of Long's professional experience with children was in films, not in a TV series shot before a studio audience.

Regulations limit how long children can work on a set. "To do a show in three hours is pretty much impossible," explains the series' star and executive producer. "What you have to do is pre-shoot one or two scenes and show them to the audience so they can keep a continuity going."

She also hadn't counted on the physicality of her role. Kelly Novak plunges into a household of macho males and a tomboy, all devoted to athletics. Early on, Long broke a finger trying to catch a football.

A native of Fort Wayne, Ind., she studied drama at Northwestern University and learned comedy timing with Chicago's Second City improv group. That led, in 1982, to the start of five years of tolerating the buffoons in a Boston saloon called "Cheers."

"During the first season," she recalls, "the repeated question in press interviews was: 'How does it feel to be at the bottom of the ratings?'

"I would say the truth: 'We feel really good about the work we're doing. That really is why I'm here.' That was naive of me. It didn't really occur to me that I might not be there if those ratings continued and if there hadn't been sufficient support for the show."

NBC program chief Brandon Tartikoff refused to be discouraged. And the show's fortunes changed after it won five Emmys, including best comedy series and best comedy actress for Long. Then Tartikoff rearranged the lineup so "The Cosby Show" and "Family Ties" led into "Cheers." Bingo!

Long appeared in a series that turned out to be a misnomer, "Good Advice." She has also starred in features such as Losin' It (Tom Cruise's first big role), Night Shift (Henry Winkler, Michael Keaton), Irreconcilable Differences (Ryan O'Neal), Outrageous Fortune (Bette Midler) and The Money Pit (Tom Hanks).

She has high expectations for "Kelly Kelly," while hoping bosses at WB will be as patient as Tartikoff.

Moving novel deals with obsession

By Elise M. Falanga

THE IRON TRACKS
Aharon Appelfeld
Schocken

Erwin Siegelbaum, the narrator of Aharon Appelfeld's novel, The Iron Tracks (Schocken, $21), has one mission: to find the Nazi officer who murdered his parents.

Siegelbaum is a peddler who travels throughout Austria by train. "Trains make me free. Without them, what would I be in this world? I board the train, and instantly I'm borne aloft on the wings of the wind."

He stops in villages and visits people he knows, but he never reveals his mission to anyone. He does, however, learn something from everyone he meets. "In short, who is a friend and who is not."

Siegelbaum is depressed and fearful, and he attempts to escape the nightmares that haunt him.

"In their godforsaken places such pleasures beckon me, exciting my memory for days on end. Often just the thought of Cafe Annon is enough to drive a pack of evil thoughts from my mind. I love those tiny remote places. Large cities, I avoid like the plague. They fill me with dread. More grievously, with melancholy."

During Siegelbaum's journeys, he reveals the many losses he has suffered during his life, which might make the reader reflect upon his own life.

Appelfeld portrays his characters as real people who have experienced pain and prejudice. Siegelbaum confides to the reader something that happened during a visit to a longtime friend: "A year ago, when I told her I was Jewish, she was surprised, but she didn't burden me with questions. That evening I realized that the information had stunned her. Though she continued to serve me meals with the same care, she no longer sat beside me."

Toward the end of the novel, Siegelbaum confronts his quarry in a moving and suspenseful moment.

As a boy, Appelfeld witnessed his mother's murder at the hands of the Nazis.

History Channel looks for viewers

By David Bauder
Associated Press

NEW YORK — When you're a niche network like The History Channel, you find an audience any way you can.

That explains why channel surfers on a weekend afternoon stand a decent chance of seeing World War II bombers strafing the ground when they click on to The History Channel.

Network executives know their primary audience is men, middle-aged and older. And on a weekend, these men are likely to be in their recliners, watching sports. If the game is boring, their fingers will be itchy on the remote control. They crave action, and gunfire will do.

The History Channel is also trying to earn viewers the old-fashioned way, through compelling programming. The three-year-old network, seen in roughly half of the nation's 98 million television homes, wants to appeal to people who aren't just preoccupied with centuries other than their own.

It has ambitious plans to reduce the number of old movies in favor of original shows. Next spring, Peter Jennings will be the host of a miniseries on the 20th century. There will be more first-run documentaries like "Israel: Birth of a Nation." And the "Modern Marvels" series on engineering feats, now seen once a week, will expand to five nights a week.

The History Channel even managed its own Leonardo DiCaprio tie-in this spring, producing a documentary on The Man in the Iron Mask to coincide with the teen idol's latest movie.

"You know what we're fighting?" said The History Channel's Abbe Raven. "We're fighting kids that have gone through school having a dull social studies teacher."

As chief programmer for the network, Raven has an office table piled with historical tomes. But there's no musty odor. While she wants to be historically accurate, she's not making TV for historians.

"We need to be good storytellers," she said. "The mission of The History Channel is to bring history alive, to make it have an impact, to touch people and excite people."

Controversial, even infamous, episodes of history have paid off for the network. One million homes tuned in to a winter documentary on the Ku Klux Klan, the channel's best ratings ever. A documentary series on Adolf Hitler produced by German television offered a new point of view to Americans.

The History Channel plans to expand "As it Happens," which filters historic events through television coverage at the time. The channel will show how the assassination of Robert F. Kennedy was reported on June 5, the 30th anniversary of his death. Such tunes to important dates or cultural events are another hallmark of programming.

The 100th anniversary of the Spanish-American War was an excuse for a documentary. Raven read The Perfect Storm, a best seller about the fate of fishermen caught in the Atlantic and commissioned a special on events surrounding the storm. And, yes, The History Channel was one of dozens of outlets to weigh in on the Titanic.

Beginning in June, a documentary series on the Mississippi River will examine the history that flowed from its waters, including the slave trade and commercial development.

"What we think works best tends to be stories of history that you have some perception of, but you never knew the whole story and have a craving to understand it," Raven said. "I call it the 'A-ha' factor."

In another nod to its bedrock audience of men, the network will start two weekly shows on Sunday nights that fall: one about guns, the other about espionage. It is a counter-programming strategy against CBS's warm drama, "Touched By an Angel."

What do the experts think? Two history professors give The History Channel a passing grade.

David H. Bennett, who teaches at Syracuse University, began watching a year ago. He occasionally directs his students of military history to watch. "They have some rich material in that area," he said. "I think it's very helpful."

Eric Foner of Columbia University appreciates the network's documentaries but recommends that programmers be more aggressive, doing a show on new history books or reflecting more of the public debate over how events are viewed historically. "I wish they could be a little more demanding of their audience," he said.

Through marketing, The History Channel is trying to make itself as indispensable to history buffs as The Weather Channel is to meteorological fans. The channel sponsors tours of historic sites and races of vintage cars across the United States.

Dan Davids, the network's general manager, citer polls that show Americans are more interested in history now than before The History Channel launched.

And the upcoming millennium can only make it better.

"That certainly has sparked more interest in history," Raven said. "What it will do is get even more people interested in history, and they will know that we're the destination for it."

Elsewhere in television: With summer's approach prompting thoughts of vacation, "Good Morning America" next week sends five "family" members in search of locations. Monday, newly appointed co-anchor Kevin Newman takes a daredevil tour of Southern Utah. Tuesday, co-anchor Lisa McRee spotlights New Mexico, broadcasting an authentic Native American healing ceremony. Wednesday, Spencer Christian visits Charleston and Beaufort, S.C., and Savannah, Ga. Thursday, Jenice Lieberman heads for country music capitals Nashville and Memphis, Tenn., as well as Branson, Mo. Friday, Dr. Nancy Snyderman takes in the Black Hills and Badlands of South Dakota. "Good Morning America" airs on ABC from 7 to 9 a.m.

Petrocelli writes latest tome on O.J.

By Linda Deutsch
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — O.J. Simpson denied that he is gradually confessing to the murder of his ex-wife and her friend, calling the accusations in lawyer Daniel Petrocelli's new book "totally ridiculous."

"I didn't do it, so I've never even thought about confessing," Simpson said in a telephone interview Tuesday with The Associated Press. "It's certainly nothing I would ever consider."

Simpson, responding to Petrocelli's new assertions for the first time, said the lawyer is trying to make news to sell his book. Petrocelli, who won a $33.5 million civil wrongful death judgment against Simpson, said he believes the football Hall of Famer who was acquitted of criminal charges in the killings of Nicole Brown Simpson and Ronald Goldman, is making a "creeping confession" in his public appearances.

Petrocelli, in a telephone news conference with reporters, cited a recent TV interview in which Simpson jokingly wielded a banana as if it were a knife, ...

"That was astonishing behavior even if you're an O.J. believer," said the attorney, who represented the Goldman family in the civil trial.

"If he were truly an innocent man he would be incapable of jesting about this," Petrocelli said. "It's his perverse way of making a creeping confession. Little by little, he acknowledges it."

"That's totally ridiculous," said Simpson, who insisted no such thought has entered his mind.

As for the Nicole Incident, Simpson said it was re-shot several times by a BBC film crew interviewing him for a report to be aired today. He said it was intended to show how some people perceive his image — "as a psycho murderer" — in contrast to his real, benign personality.

Petrocelli, who is on a tour promoting his new book, Triumph of Justice: The Final Judgment on the Simpson Saga, also cited a comment Simpson made during an interview with Esquire Magazine earlier this year.

In the article, Simpson was quoted as saying: "Let's say I committed this crime. Even if I did do this, it would have to have been because I loved her very much, right?"

The author of the article has said she had no idea what he meant.

Petrocelli said that Simpson would admit to the murders if he believed a confession would win him public acceptance.

"I don't think he will ever crack. He's a strong individual and a survivor," Petrocelli said. "But public acceptance is important to him. He'd like to win back the public and if admitting it would get him there he might do it."

Simpson said there's nothing to admit and noted that Fred Goldman, father of Ron, had offered to forgive the $33.5 million judgment he won if Simpson would confess, and he had refused the offer.

Petrocelli said Simpson's property, which was seized and placed in a sheriff's warehouse, may be auctioned later this year to pay the civil suit award, though an appeal of the civil case is pending. He said he doesn't think much of it will ever be paid. What then was the triumph of the civil trial?

"Simpson was branded as a killer," Petrocelli said. "That was the purpose of the civil trial. Even though he's out there he wears that badge for all of his life and all of eternity. That's the most we could ask of the system."

Surreal painter Margitte celebrated

By Raf Casert
Associated Press

BRUSSELS, Belgium — These are surreal times in Belgium. Potatoes seem to fly over plates at a gourmet restaurant. Art is mistaken for garbage. Naked blue women adorn stamps.

And in the most stately of museums, hundreds of visitors gawk at a rudimentary drawing of a pipe, with an admonition written underneath: "This continues not to be a pipe."

Belgians are celebrating the centenary of the birth of Rene Magritte, by far the quirkiest of the great painters this nation has produced over the ages — from the brothers Van Eyck to Pieter Breughel and Peter Paul Rubens to James Ensor.

"He really is the milestone of surrealism," said art expert Lucienne Persyn.

Perhaps the most surreal aspect of all is that Magritte was not some eccentric painter whose life was almost bigger than his work, but a withdrawn man who would have made an accountant look adventurous.

Yet he made a career of juxtaposing contradictory images, slamming fiery trains out of rustic fireplaces, letting showers of bourgeois clerks in bowlers rain down on equally drab Belgian streets and suffocating huge apples in claustrophobic living rooms. But no doubt his most famous, and most imitated, concept is the This Is Not a Pipe painting, a later version of which is included in the Magritte exhibit at the Royal Fine-Arts Museum.

"If you think it is a pipe, try lighting it," Magritte mused. Years before it became fashionable in the art world, he let it be known that nothing in what it seems. This sense of the unexpected, combined with his superb draftsmanship, helped position Magritte among the great surrealists of the time, like Salvador Dali and Max Ernst.

The exhibit, which runs through June, has helped turn Belgium into a surrealist playground, with special projects in restaurants, post offices, chess clubs, wine clubs and movie theaters.

Even British rock is doing its bit from abroad. Oasis has a Magritte video for its latest hit that features men in bowlers with umbrellas floating in the sky.

But what could be more Belgian than to have Magritte become a gastronomic delight? At the Leopold restaurant, chef Peter Martens is delicately stands potatoes on their ends to approach Magritte's rock floating over the sea in The Castle in the Pyrenees.

Apart from the visual resemblance, Martens honors the Magritte principle that this potato is not really a potato. Cut it open and discover a steaming delight with lobster, sole and leek.

"It had to be visually alike, but it was tough to come up with something to represent his ideas," said Martens.

His gravity-defying dish seems small potatoes compared with the trouble the Leopold went to to get the dish in front of customers. The biggest problem before the potato could fly was a legal issue.

"In fact there is a copyright on everything from Magritte," said Luc De Meulemeester, the man behind the Leopold's idea. After steadfast refusals from the artist's estate, it took the intervention of the curator of the Royal Fine-Arts Museum to get approval.

In the coastal city of Ostend, meanwhile, a local politician unwittingly tried to get a Magritte-related artwork tossed on the trash heap.

As part of an exhibit highlighting Magritte's influence on contemporary art, a white table was put askew against a tree in an Ostend park. The former alderman thought it was illegally dumped old furniture and reported it. Garbage collectors were already on the way when his mistake was discovered.

Close to Brussels' Midi station, tens of thousands of commuters each day see a gray and grimy neighborhood briefly light up on the side of a huge garage, where giant Magritte birds wear his trademark cloud pattern instead of feathers.

Nude women are making a rare appearance at Belgium's post offices. A commemorative stamp reproduces a Magritte painting of a naked woman who is blue above the waist, the color of her skin matching the sky in the background.

But the advertising and hype are all a bit too much for some of Magritte's artistic heirs, who claim his memory is being sullied in the name of commercialism.

"This exhibition is in my eyes simply a complete shift from the original surrealist idea," said surrealist painter Jacques Lacomblez. "They used the Magritte exhibition as a tool in a general tourist promotion campaign."

Sarah Chang recalls beginnings as violinist

By Mary Campbell
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) — Violinist Sarah Chang remembers her audition for Zubin Mehta, artistic director of the New York Philharmonic. It was on a Thursday afternoon. She was 8-years-old and had already been studying violin for four years.

"On Friday he called. 'Can you play tomorrow? I can't give you a rehearsal because the orchestra has already rehearsed. Are you willing to just go out and play?'"

Her response?

"I grabbed that chance."

The Paganini Violin Concerto No. 1 went well that day, and Chang, 17, is now an acclaimed violinist who has performed in concerts worldwide. This past March, she was back with the New York Philharmonic. She played Sibelius' Violin Concerto in D Minor. The concert was aired on the PBS program, "Live From Lincoln Center."

She is poised and mature now, but indulgent about the foibles of childhood.

"We went out to dinner with Kurt Masur (the Philharmonic's current artistic director)," she says. "My brother came along. He's 10. You go to a fancy restaurant. He is making paper airplanes and folding cranes. The maestro was right there folding along with him. He is such a family man. It was just so sweet."

Currently in the world of classical music, youth is in. And although young violinists Jennifer Koh, David Chan and Hilary Hahn also have an Asian heritage, Chang thinks it's coincidental. A few years ago, almost all the hot young violinists were from Israel. Says Chang, "Who knows what it'll be in 10 years?"

When she was born, her parents bestowed Chang with a Korean name, Young Joo. But when her mother's teacher, composer George Crumb, visited the hospital, he suggested an American name — just in case the infant grew up to be a performer.

His choice? Sarah.

Myung Jun Chang says that even as a tot, Chang quickly memorized music and could play whatever she heard.

"She was my first baby and my college classmates were single. I had no comparison," Mrs. Chang says. "I thought all kids were doing like that."

Now Chang is making the shift from relying solely on her inherent musical gifts. It's a transition that all classical instrumentalists must go through.

"I feel playing by instinct can only last so long," she says. "I figured

The latest on Allen & Lennon

NEW YORK (AP) — At 22, the "Beautiful Boy" immortalized in John Lennon's 1980 song of the same name is ready to make his own mark on the music world.

Sean Lennon's debut album, Into the Sun, is set for a May 19 release. It's described as a mix of rock, jazz and bossa nova stylings.

The youngest Lennon, who penned his first song at 12, dropped out of Columbia University to enter the family business — music.

"I kind of just didn't want to waste my time there... I wanted to be hanging out with my friends and starting rock bands," the son of former Beatle John Lennon and Yoko Ono told Entertainment Weekly for its May 8 issue.

Sean Lennon, who was 5 when his father was shot to death Dec. 8, 1980 in front of his New York apartment building, said it's "really nice" whenever he hears his dad singing on the radio, "almost as if he's saying, 'Hey, how are you?' or 'I'm still around.' It's almost magical."

Jim Lampley was perched on a mountain peak for his anchor job at the Nagano Olympics For the Goodwill Games, he'll do his announcing from a boat.

Lampley, who was TNT's Olympics host in Japan, was hired Tuesday to be the anchor of TBS' 45 hours of mostly live coverage of the Goodwill Games in New York in July.

At the Olympic Games, Lampley had an outdoor set in the mountains. He'll be on a boat at a different location around the island of Manhattan each night for the Goodwill Games.

"I don't know as much of the history from the Goodwill Games as I do from the Olympics," he said. "I will spend the next few months learning."

George Michael's arraignment on a misdemeanor lewd conduct charge was postponed until May 15 at his lawyer's request.

Defense attorney Ira Reiner said that he needed more time to review the case. The 34-year-old British-born heartthrob didn't attend the brief hearing in Municipal Court on Tuesday.

Reiner said Michael was "in very good humor and good spirits." Michael, whose hits include "I Want Your Sex" and "Faith," was charged with a single count of lewd conduct after his arrest April 7 in a park bathroom. Police haven't said what he is alleged to have done.

The charge carries a maximum sentence of six months in jail and a $1,000 fine.

Michael, who was released on $500 bail, later told CNN he was gay. Of the incident, he said, "I won't even say it's the first time it's happened."

Caroline Paul is a firefighter who doesn't even own a bright red bathing suit, though she's often mistaken for her identical twin sister, Alexandra, late of "Baywatch."

"I could be coming off a fire truck and someone will say, 'Hey, you're that girl from that 'Baywatch' show. The one with the real breasts," Caroline Paul, 34, told Entertainment Weekly for the magazine's May 8 issue.

Her sister played Lt. Stephanie Holden, David Hasselhoff's former boss on "Baywatch."

But it's fire that fascinates Caroline.

She is an eight-year veteran of the San Francisco Fire Department and the author of Fighting Fire, a behind-the-flames account of her job.

When Paul was hired, she was one of 16 women in the 1,400-person fire department. Now there are 134. Paul, a Stanford University graduate, said her family supported her job decision.

"If there's a fire, I want to be there," said Paul. "Maybe because in being so close to death, I think I understand what it means to be truly alive."

The National Enquirer has settled a libel lawsuit brought by Pamela Anderson and Tommy Lee after the tabloid reported they had a secret deal to reap more than $8 million in profits from their honeymoon sex tape.

Details of Friday's deal were not released, but Anderson's lawyer, Ed Masry, said Tuesday: "Pam's happy, the Enquirer's happy, everybody's happy."

The lawsuit alleged that the National Enquirer falsely reported the now-estranged couple worked out a deal with Internet Entertainment Group to profit from the X-rated home movie. The couple claim the tape was stolen from their Malibu home by a worker on a renovation project. It is now widely available in adult shops and over the Internet.

Anderson and Lee also have sued Seattle-based distributor IEG, alleging the couple never gave the company permission to market the tape.

Anderson has filed for divorce from her husband, who is facing possible jail time for allegedly hitting her.

Tim Allen speaks but doesn't appear on a court-ordered video he made to fulfill his drunken driving conviction.

The actor plays a caller to a program called "Choose to Drink, Choose to Get a Ride." He calls in while the host of the program talks with a group of men and women in a bar.

"I was back here not too long ago and had a good time with some good friends, then I made a mistake — and a big one," Allen said in the 12-minute video.

"I got behind the wheel. I knew better, I knew it only takes a couple of drinks to become impaired and become a real danger to someone else on the road."

The star of "Home Improvement" pleaded guilty last year to drunken driving after his Ferrari was clocked at 70 mph in a 40-mph zone. Police said his blood-alcohol level was 0.15 percent, above the state's legal limit of 0.10.

Allen checked into a California rehabilitation clinic last month as part of his sentence. He's "doing great" and was expected to be released soon, spokeswoman Marleah Leslie said yesterday.

Lopez & Lear team up for new TV series

By Minerva Canto
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — At 17, Josefina Lopez was an undocumented immigrant, working in a sewing factory and dreaming of the day she would be a legal resident and able to go to college.

At night, she vented her frustrations by writing. Using anger as inspiration, Lopez wrote an award-winning play that same year. Within two years, it was in production in small theaters, and eventually went nationwide.

Now 29, the funny and passionate writer wants to expand her audience through television. A former staff writer on "Living Single," Lopez is working with pioneering TV producer Norman Lear to develop a sitcom pilot about Hispanics, "The Chavez Family." She described the show, which is being shopped to networks, as a blend of "Married ... With Children" and the Lear-produced "All in the Family."

"I love her," Lear said. "She's extremely talented." In an industry where Hispanics are nearly invisible on and off-screen, such a project is ambitious. Some might say its mass appeal is dubious.

A Michigan State University study, analyzing a week of broadcast network programming from 1996, found only 18 Hispanics among 566 major and minor characters on TV.

And according to the Screen Actors Guild, Hispanic performers in film and TV roles in 1997 made up 4 percent of all actors. But Lear and Lopez believe the project will be successful.

"I think it can happen," Lear said. "I think the American public is ready for anything that's right."

"Everybody wants a Latino show, but nobody wants to take a chance," Lopez said. "This could be the project."

In 1984, Lear produced the short-lived "a.k.a. Pablo," starring comedian Paul Rodriguez. With a nearly all Hispanic cast, the show was an example of the experimentation that has garnered Lear accolades and long-running sitcoms, but also a few failed shows.

"a.k.a. Pablo" earned low ratings and went off the air after six episodes, which Lear thinks was not enough time to give the show a fair shake.

Lopez thinks the show failed because the concept of a Hispanic-themed sitcom was ahead of its time and the show relied on jokes that stereotyped Hispanics.

"The Chavez Family," she said, is representative of the Latino experience. "The laughter comes out of the experiences rather than stereotypical things."

Among recognition earned by Lopez' several successful plays and TV scripts, "Simply Maria or the American Dream" won an Emmy after it was performed on public television in San Diego. The National Conference of Christians and Jews honored it for promoting cultural understanding.

She caught Lear's eye with Real Women Have Curves, a play about women working in a sewing factory, like the one where Lopez worked as a teenager.

Throughout her career, Lopez has used her experiences for performance material, writing about her father's infidelity, the pain of cultural assimilation, and dealing with the machismo inherent in the Hispanic culture.

She's been so candid about her family life that her family has, at times, been embarrassed.

"How could you tell everyone?" they've asked her, even refusing to attend an awards ceremony.

But it is Lopez's ability to deal honestly with Hispanics and their lives that may be the key to her success.

"She has a real emotional and comedic side to the travails of part of her life and Latino life," said Bill Miller, Edward James Olmos' partner at the Olmos Production Co. "She can really express the irony that given [the audience] a real bang and stops them in their tracks."

Lopez is working on a couple of TV movie scripts for Olmos' company, including "The Lupe Vasquez Story," about a young homeless woman who earns a scholarship to Stanford and graduates at the top of her class to work in Silicon Valley.

"We're one prominent production company, but we need more. We need many more," Miller said. "The amount of Latinos in the United States are over 30 million who are watching television, who want to watch Latino-themed shows. It's a power that can no longer be overlooked by the networks, by the studios."

that out very quickly. You have to have a very strong foundation and base. You have to have a lot of nurturing and guidance. Most of my guidance has come from Miss [Dorothy] DeLay at Juilliard and from many conductors and orchestras."

Music became her entire life when she was about 13 years old. "Because people wanted me to be a great musician, not just a great child violinist, I think everybody who cared for me wanted me to think for myself about music.

"Growing up is hard anyway. To develop a music career on top of that can be hard," Chang says. "But I've always had a great time doing this. I've always loved being onstage and I love recording also."

Her latest of seven CDs for EMI is Sibelius' Violin Concerto in D Minor and Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto in E Minor, performed with the Berlin Philharmonic.

Chang doesn't think she's completed her musical adolescence. But "I feel I've gone through a lot. Reviewers say when they listen to me onstage, they don't hear a child."

Last Dec. 10, on her 17th birthday, Chang played a recital in London.

"What is nice when they stick a concert on your birthday is, they try to make up for it by giving you every imaginable party. The day before and day of and day after, they had celebrations, because they feel so guilty about making me work on that day. I had a great time."

And now that Chang is older, buying clothes for performances is much more fun.

"When I was 13 to 15, it was really hard," Chang says. "I didn't want to wear baby-doll dresses anymore. I couldn't wear grown-up dresses either. Nothing seemed to fit right. We'd take it in or take it out or whatever. It's much easier now."

She adds: "I've got a great excuse to get all these dresses."

Sanders taking the Bible "Prime Time"

By Christy Lemire
Associated Press

PLANO, Texas — Deion Sanders pulls up to the building in his sleek, black Mercedes with tinted windows. All eyes are on him as he glides inside, dressed in a raspberry-colored linen suit and matching leather shoes.

He hugs and high-fives those who flock to him, surround him, adore him.

The Dallas Cowboys cornerback is not at a nightclub or a party after a big win. This is a Tuesday, and he is at church to lead his weekly Bible study class. He takes the stage and a microphone, preaching "Praise God" and "Hallelujah" to the rapt group as gospel music blares in the background.

Sanders' "Prime Time Tuesdays" draw hundreds each week — some true believers, others who simply want to catch a glimpse of the born-again Christian.

Within six months, the group has grown from a half-a-dozen teammates in Sanders' living room to about 400 worshippers simply through word of mouth. The crowd is a mix of black and white, young and old.

Sanders has kept the Bible classes quiet, seemingly out of character for a star who nicknamed himself "Neon Deion" and "Prime Time" and who struts and high-steps every time he makes an interception or scores a touchdown.

When The Associated Press attended a recent session, Sanders said it was the first time he'd allowed media coverage. His reason: "We don't want to taint the word of the Lord." He's also perhaps fed up with people, including sports columnists, questioning his "rebirth."

"They talked about me when I was in the world. They're going to talk about me now that I'm delivered," he said.

Sanders is among a growing number of NFL players who make religion a big part of their lives. Reggie White has made headlines from the pulpit and many other stars have made their faith public.

But Sanders' image — on a team known for its problems off the field — leaves some skeptical of his sincerity.

"People are waiting to see if this is a long-term change," said Marc Dickmann, a spokesman for Athletes in Action, a nationwide group that promotes Christianity in sports. "There are plenty of stories of athletes coming into religious faith and then falling off the platform, getting caught in some story of ill repute."

Sanders said his religious transformation came a year ago when he was depressed and close to suicide. Last month, he donated $1 million to The Potter's House, the Dallas church he credits with his salvation. About half that money comes from the advance Sanders received for his upcoming autobiography, "Power, Money and Sex. It's a Man Thing," which details how his fast-paced lifestyle brought him no fulfillment.

But, in many ways, Sanders is as flashy as ever.

When he takes the church stage at Bible study, the electricity level suddenly jumps a few notches. He grabs the microphone and the first words out of his mouth are "Praise God."

He continues, the gospel music pounding behind him, "I said hallelujah."

When he doesn't get quite the reaction he wants, Sanders puts a hand on his hip, pouts and growls: "I really don't think you heard me. I ain't speakin' [expletive] unless I know if you understand me, because I said hallelujah!"

The crowd jumps and cheers.

Sanders' stage presence evokes memories of Deion the rap singer, who was the opening act for Boyz II Men in 1994. He stomps his foot to the music. He pumps his arms high in the air, prompting the crowd with the palms-up, raise-the-roof gesture.

After a few raucous minutes, Sanders brings the mood down. The music becomes quieter, as does his voice. He speaks in breathy, almost seductive tones.

"We don't have to tell nobody at work that we're saved," he says, pausing, then whispering, "We show them."

Worshippers respond with a chorus of "amens."

The evening's Bible study topics include temptation, which Sanders says was his downfall. His wife, Carolyn, divorced him recently and moved with their son and daughter to Houston. The most emotional moment of the evening comes toward the end, when Sanders and the Rev. David Forbes ask worshippers who are having a rough time to come forward for a blessing.

Sanders approaches a tall man wearing jeans and hiking boots, looks him in the eye, takes him in his arms and the man crumbles into a heap of sobs. He holds him for about five minutes, whispering encouraging words in his ear. Afterward, he brings the man tissues and guides him back to his seat.

Mutombo, Jordan named to All–Defensive squad

By Nancy Armour
Associated Press

CHICAGO — Let Allen Iverson perfect his crossover dribble. Shaquille O'Neal can rattle all the rims he wants with his monster dunks. Michael Jordan will match those pretty moves and any others. Then he will go down to the other end of the floor and snatch the ball right out of your hands.

Jordan, who won a record 10th NBA scoring title this season, was selected to a record ninth All-Defensive team yesterday. Joining him was Chicago Bulls teammate Scottie Pippen, who made his seventh team.

"We pride ourselves on playing solid defense," Jordan said. "Offensively we can go on and off, maybe make some jumpers or maybe not. But defense, we know, wins championships."

Just look at Chicago's five NBA titles this decade. Though the Bulls have Jordan, who averaged 28.7 points per game to edge O'Neal for the scoring title, defense has been the cornerstone of their title runs.

And as the Bulls get older and the titles pile up, defense becomes even more important. On Sunday, even though everyone but Jordan and Pippen struggled offensively, Chicago still beat New Jersey 83-70 by holding the Nets to 10 points in the third quarter and 36 percent shooting overall.

"Right now, that's what we have to rely on," Pippen said. "Defensively, that's what this team's breed and butter is. That's how we have to create some offense."

Joining Jordan and Pippen on the first team are Karl Malone of the Utah Jazz at forward; guard Gary Payton of the Seattle SuperSonics and center Dikembe Mutombo of the Atlanta Hawks. Payton made the defensive team for the fifth time. Mutombo, chosen the NBA's defensive player of the year Tuesday, and Malone are on the team for the second time.

Jordan has now passed Bobby Jones for most selections to the defensive team. He was the leading vote-getter on the defensive team, collecting 25 first-place votes and 53 points from the 29 NBA coaches who vote on it.

He was the only player named on the maximum 28 ballots. Coaches could not vote for players on their own team.

That the first team is made up of veterans shouldn't come as any surprise, Pippen said. No rookie has made the first team since the award began after the 1968-69 season.

Tim Duncan, the rookie of the year from the San Antonio Spurs, made the second team. But Pippen said most young players are so intent on creating a trademark move that defense is becoming a lost art.

"It's a part of the game that really goes unnoticed to some degree," Pippen said. "The younger players, they all come in and want to have a great, patented move. That's their thing coming into the game, have a killer crossover or have a great dunk.

"From the defensive standpoint, there hasn't been anyone lately that's come in the league and really made a great defensive stand or been known as a defensive player."

The rest of the second team consists of Charles Oakley of the New York Knicks at forward; guards Mookie Blaylock of the Hawks and Eddie Jones of the Los Angeles Lakers; and center David Robinson of the Spurs.

Duncan is the fifth rookie to make the all-defensive second-team. The others were Robinson (1989-90); Manute Bol (1985-86); Hakeem Olajuwon (1984-85) and Kareem Abdul-Jabbar (1969-70).

■ Rodriguez

Then Rodriguez changed his mind.

It was part pride of playing in his home country; part love of a game he's willing to play 365 days a year.

"I don't worry about getting hurt," he said. "I'm in good shape. I came into the season with good timing and that's one reason why I'm off to such a good start."

However, little injuries can take their toll on a catcher. Rodriguez sprained a left thumb ligament early in the season and it still gives him trouble.

Against the New York Yankees on Tuesday night he allowed a rare passed ball on a low inside pitch. Rodriguez was so upset after the inning he threw his glove in the dugout.

Then he hurt himself throwing out a runner when his hand slammed into the back of a Yankee batter.

"That's a catcher's life," Rodriguez said. "You always have to live with little injuries."

In that game, Rodriguez also picked off his fourth runner of the year.

"You can't go to sleep a minute out there when Rodriguez is behind the plate," Yankees manager Joe Torre said. "If he doesn't hurt you with his bat, he'll hurt you with his arm."

The Yankees came into the game leading the majors in stolen bases with 44, but Rodriguez made them pay every time they wandered from the base.

Texas manager Johnny Oates hopes his 26-year-old catcher will be healthy 10 years from now. But he wonders how much punishment the body can take.

"I don't see how Pudge can play until he's 35 if he keeps playing winter ball," he said.

In any case, Oates has devised a scheme to keep Rodriguez in the lineup every day but give him a few days of rest. Rodriguez has been inserted into several games as a designated hitter, with Bill Hasselman going behind the plate.

"We can't afford to take his bat out of the lineup," Oates said. "It's hard to criticize him for wanting to be a player. And what a player he is. But we just hope he won't get worn out."

Rodriguez wants to start his sixth consecutive All-Star game and bring the Rangers a division title.

"We have a good team this year, maybe as good or better than our 1996 team," Rodriguez said.

tion. For UMass to achieve the final goal, it will need to put it all together for three days in California, and come up with a slight upset of No. 2 seeded Stanford to advance to the final four.

"We began putting together a game plan for Stanford, and we don't want to overlook Michigan, but we'll be ready to get to the next level. I'm thinking maybe Stanford will not prepare for us the way we have for them. All I can ask is that the players give it their all, and I know they will," said McOsker.

ERA, and Alicia Smith holds a .325 batting average, along with a 2.19 ERA.

If Gutridge can manage to hit well against the two Smith's and maintain her batting average, she will become the first Minutewomen to hit over .400 since 1994. Her team-high 43 RBI are just one shy of tying both the school single season and career records. Fourteen of those RBI were game- winners.

Gutridge's hard work and superb talents have paid off for her. She was selected to the USA Softball's pool of 60 elite athletes. She trained at the U.S. Olympic Training Center in San Diego over Christmas break, and played in the Pan Am games last summer in Columbia. Gutridge, along with Henderson, will continue to represent the U.S. in several international tournaments, leading up to the 2000 Olympic Games in Sydney, Australia.

"Playing at that level of competition makes you work a lot harder," Gutridge said. "You want to be the best that you can be, so that you can accomplish your dreams."

Johnson makes return, Ewing may follow

By Hank Lowenkron
Associated Press

INDIANAPOLIS — Help is on the way for the New York Knicks. Larry Johnson returns from suspension for Game 2 of the Eastern Conference semifinals tonight. But the more intriguing development — the availability of Patrick Ewing — remained uncertain yesterday.

"It will really give them an emotional lift," Indiana forward Dale Davis said of the possible return by Ewing, who hasn't played since fracturing his right wrist Dec. 20. "That's the kind of team they are. They're a tough team and with him they'll be more effective."

New York coach Jeff Van Gundy said Ewing yesterday had his most physical practice since the injury, but had still not received medical clearance to play.

"When I get that clearance, he'll play," he said. "When that will be, I don't know."

Ewing stayed after his teammates left Market Square Arena to shoot and work on his passing. He declined to speak to the media.

"He seemed fine," Van Gundy said. "We're more worried about Indiana than we are of whether Patrick comes back. It really doesn't dominate our thinking right now."

"I just hope that if he comes back, he's 100 percent healthy physically," said Indiana guard Mark Jackson of Ewing, his friend and former teammate. "They're nowhere as good a team without Patrick Ewing. He's a Hall of Fame center and one of the best to ever play the game."

Van Gundy said if Ewing played he wouldn't be a savior.

"We don't need a savior. We need some guys to rebound. We need some guys to stay in front of the ball on defense. We need guys to make the extra pass," Van Gundy said. "When we play right, we're pretty good. Last night after the first 11 minutes we were dominated. It was one of the worst butt-kickings I've been around."

Johnson missed Game 1 on Tuesday in which Indiana overcame a 19-point deficit to win 93-83. He was completing the two-game suspension he received for fighting with Miami's Alonzo Mourning in Game 4 of their first-round series.

The Pacers expect a bigger challenge from the Knicks with the return of Johnson.

"He gives them more of a presence down low. It adds another dimension to their whole team," Antonio Davis said. "He draws the double team, he's great at dishing it out and he's going to rebound."

Indiana coach Larry Bird wasn't worrying about Ewing's possible return.

"If Patrick comes out and plays, he plays. If he don't, he don't. There's nothing we can do about it. Let's wait until he gets out there," said Bird, no stranger to coming back from injury during his 13-year career with the Boston Celtics.

"There's nothing you can do to prepare yourself for going out and playing the game, especially in the playoffs," Bird added.

Rik Smits, who had a horrid shooting night as he made just 3-of-19 shots in the opener, would be lining up against Ewing.

"We've had some battles in the past. I know what he will do, and he knows how I will play. It will be physical," Smits said. "I don't want to hurt anybody. I would just play my game. I'm never out there intentionally to hurt anyone. But if he comes out on the court and the ball gets thrown up, the game is the game. In certain situations you want to put a guy on the [foul] line."

Games 3 and 4 will be played in New York on Saturday and Sunday. Van Gundy was asked about the possibility of Ewing making an emotional return on his home court.

"When he's cleared to play, be it tomorrow, or two weeks or next year, then he starts to play," Van Gundy said.

NCAA tournament picture doesn't include Minutemen

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Staff

Editor's note: A portion of this story originally ran in Monday's Collegian, but due to a graphical error, half of it did not appear in the paper. Following is the original article, although it has been edited for timeliness.

The lesson learned from the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team's 14–8 loss to Brown is to never underestimate the power of a heated rivalry. Despite having a 3–9 record, all that was really needed was a loose attitude and an all–out performance on senior day.

Midway through the year, playing in the NCAA tournament could have been taken for granted after moving to 6–0 with a 10–4 victory over the Army Cadets. Then, the power of college lacrosse came to town in the form of Duke, with the Blue Devils embarrassing the Minutemen in front of a packed house, winning 15–4. From then on, the wind died down and the sail stood still. As the Minutemen stood in place, they fell behind the rest of the field, eventually falling out of contention for one of the 12 bids into the tournament.

With the absence of UMass (7–5) in the brackets announced Sunday comes the end of nine fine careers on the Amherst campus, including the entire starting defense. The midfield will also have its holes upon the graduation of co– captains Mike DelPercio and P.G. Massey, assist leader Chris Martens, and Chris Robbins. Spot attackman Henry Wilson is the only player lost from the attack.

Loyola, which beat UMass 10–8 this season, was ranked first among the 12, followed by Princeton, Syracuse, and Johns Hopkins. These teams will get a bye into round two.

Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium will be the North site for the first round of the NCAA tournament. In it, fans will catch three ACC teams and a Division I surprise. At noon on Saturday, No. 7 Duke and No. 12 North Carolina will try their rivalry out on the grass. The two squads met earlier in the year, with the Blue Devils upending the Tar Heels, 13–9. The selection committee took Carolina despite the Tar Heels' late season scheduling of a game against Ohio State, a game they took easily to even up their record at 7–7. The committee does not allow an under .500 team into the tournament under any condition.

At approximately 2:30 p.m., No. 6 Virginia, which was snowed out in their previous visit to Amherst this season, will try their hands against No. 11 Hobart. The Statesmen finished the year with four straight losses to four tournament teams by an average of 8.5 goals.

Homewood Field in Baltimore will host the south side games where on Sunday, No. 5 Maryland will play No. 9 Butler. Following that, No. 8 Maryland–Baltimore County will tangle with No. 10 Georgetown. The Retrievers of UMBC found their way into the tournament through the back door by defeating Maryland 12–8 on the final day of regular–season play. They also defeated the Hoyas earlier in the year 12–11.

According to the selection committee's John Parry, while contenders dropped out of consideration, indirectly, so did others. Case in point, Harvard, which seemed to many as a sure–fire bid, fell victim to the Minutemen's slide. Likewise, UMass's 7–6 victory over Hofstra looked less impressive after the Flying Dutchmen finished the year with an 8–4 loss to Notre Dame. The last time a New England team did not make the tournament was in 1984.

Women's water polo set for second trip to nationals

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

Head west UMass, head west.

The No. 6 Massachusetts women's water polo team is heading to Los Angeles, Calif. for the United States Water Polo Collegiate Championships for the second straight season.

The trip begins on May 8, when UMass (29–3) will play a round robin competition against No. 10 Michigan and No. 2 Stanford. The Minutewomen and coach Dan McOsker are looking for a solid performance this year as they already have the experience of being there last year.

Katie Grogan

"Making it last year is huge. We've already been there, the initial awe is gone and the schedule of this tournament will not overwhelm us," McOsker said.

The women head into nationals riding high off of their first–ever Eastern title, which they claimed by defeating Maryland, 9–8 in double overtime. Andrea Vazquez won the Most Valuable Player at Easterns, while Katie Grogan was named first team All–Eastern, and Marci Hupp made second team.

"We were down most of the Maryland game. What was good about that game is that we had to settle down and play each quarter like it was a new game," said Grogan, an All– American.

UMass has a good understanding of the field for two reasons. First, UMass has played nine matches against the competition it will face at nationals. It has gone 6–3 this season against the teams at nationals.

Secondly, the Minutewomen have already made a trip to California earlier this season (March 14–22), a trip which McOsker labeled a great success.

The UMass women's water polo team will head to Nationals this weekend, its second trip to the championships in as many years.

"We progressed so much as a team that week, and I think it will help us so much as we prepare for nationals," McOsker said.

"Having played western teams before gives us perspective on what we need to do to win, and will give us insight to their style of play, which is different," Grogan said.

The women's water polo program at UMass is only four years old as a varsity sport, but has already accomplished impressive results. The Minutewomen have won two New England Championships, one Eastern title and have qualified for two national championship trips.

"When the program first started as a club, we had someone come in and teach us how to play, and now we are heading to the nationals, it's incredible," senior Barbara Hickey said.

Offensively, UMass has been power on the shoulders of Grogan, who has already broken her own record of 91 goals in a season with 93 so far this year. Her partner in crime, Andrea Vazquez, has netted 75 goals of her own this season, including 18 goals in five games at Easterns.

The team also has a strong supporting cast, which includes sophomores Hupp, who has tallied 55 scores this season, and Claudia Clement, who has chipped in with 35 goals and 24 assists. Freshman Sarah Newell has also been a pleasant surprise as she has tallied 52 points on the season. 29 on goals.

"We all need to play our game, we all need to step it up a notch. We had a lot of players step it up against Maryland, and I can see many players, playing really, really well," Grogan said.

Defensively, UMass has to keep up the pressure, which has been successful all season.

The Minutewomen defense has allowed only 40 goals during their current 21–game winning streak, an average of 1.9 goals per game. Junior goalie Peggy Nieves has been a mainstay for this team defensively.

"Peggy will be crucial for us, but we also need the defense in front of her, if we start to play sloppy and get ejected, we will have problems. So yeah, it's going to be a combined effort out there, defense and goalie working together," McOsker said.

The Minutewomen have shown their domination of the East, going a perfect 23–0, against Eastern competi-

Wood whiffs record-tying 20 batters

By Rick Gano
Associated Press

CHICAGO — Rookie Kerry Wood tied the major league record with 20 strikeouts in a nine-inning game, pitching a one-hitter yesterday to lead the Chicago Cubs over the Houston Astros 2-0.

Wood, a right-hander who will turn 21 on June 16, tied the record set by Boston's Roger Clemens against Seattle on April 29, 1986, and matched by Clemens against Detroit on Sept. 18, 1996.

"I'm out of words. I don't have anything to say," said Wood, making only the fifth start of his major league career. "To tell you the truth, I didn't have a very good warmup today."

Wood (3-2) struck out the side in the first, fifth, seventh and eighth innings, fanned two each in the second, fourth and ninth, and one each in the third and the sixth.

He struck out pinch-hitter Billy Spiers on a 1-2 pitch leading off the ninth, his seventh straight strikeout. Craig Biggio then grounded to shortstop on a 1-0 pitch. Wood tied the record by fanning Derek Bell on a 1-2 pitch.

"I'm going to give most of the credit to the fans," Wood said. "They were in it the whole game. My adrenaline was racing."

Wood set the NL record for a nine-inning game, breaking the old mark of 19 by St. Louis' Steve Carlton against the Mets in 1969, New York's Tom Seaver against San Diego in 1970 and the Mets' David Cone against Philadelphia in 1991.

Wood, who struck out every batter at least once, broke the previous rookie record of 18, set by Bill Gullickson against the Cubs on Sept. 10, 1980.

The major league record for an extra-inning game is 21 by Tom Cheney for Washington against Baltimore in a 16-inning game on Sept. 12, 1962.

"I couldn't even tell you how many I had," Wood said. The only hit he allowed was a single by Ricky Gutierrez leading off the third. The two-hopper between shortstop and third base bounced off the glove of third baseman Kevin Orie.

Wood was mobbed by his teammates after Bell missed the game's final pitch. In his first complete game in the majors, the rookie fanned the Astros' 3-4-5 hitters — Jeff Bagwell, Jack Howell and Moises Alou — in all three of their at-bats. He walked none but hit Biggio with a pitch.

He credited catcher Sandy Martinez for his success.

"He did a great job today," Wood said. "I threw everything he wanted. We were pretty much on the same page all day."

Wood raised his season total to 43 strikeouts in 27 1-3 innings. His previous strikeout high came in his previous start, on April 30 against St. Louis. His minor-league high was 14 strikeouts. Houston's Shane Reynolds (2-3) pitched a eight-hitter and struck out 10. Houston's season high.

Gutridge an unmistakable force for softball

By Jackie Leroux
Collegian Staff

JORMA KANSANEN / COLLEGIAN
Senior Kim Gutridge has matched her success at the plate with her strong play at first base for the UMass softball team.

Imagine yourself as a batter going up to the plate against the defense of the No. 24 Massachusetts softball team. Your first task is to try (emphasis on the word try here) to get a hit off of junior pitcher Danielle Henderson.

Okay let's see, she leads the nation in strikeouts per game, holds the NCAA record for strikeouts per seven innings at 12.1, holds the Atlantic 10 and school records for strikeouts in a season, and has broken about a bazillion and one other records. Looks like the odds may be just a little bit against you.

But let's say you're a really good hitter, and you actually manage to snag a hit. It heads off somewhere towards the shortstop, and you start kicking up dust, hoping to make it to first. As you near the plate, you can see the throw coming in out of the corner of your eye. It looks like it's too high. You're going to make it.

Alright, hold it right there. You were so busy worrying about Henderson, you forgot what lies at first base. The one and only Kim Gutridge. Senior co-captain and first basemen extraordinaire. Holder of a .993 fielding percentage. Using her athletic prowess, she makes a leap, snags the ball in the air, and tags the base with her foot. You're out.

With a lot of the attention put on superstar pitcher Henderson, people sometimes overlook Gutridge. But the Atlantic 10 All-Conference selection is a key component of UMass' success.

"Gutty has meant everything to this program," coach Elaine Sortino said. "She is one of the finest players the University of Massachusetts will ever come to know."

Last year Gutridge asserted herself as one of the most powerful bats on the UMass squad. She led the team in RBIs and hits, and helped her team earn the Atlantic 10 championship, and eventually a trip to the Women's College World Series.

In this year's quest to return to the World Series, she has followed suit. After winning the A-10 tournament championship again, the Minutewomen will play Hofstra University in an NCAA play-in series today at Hofstra at 2:30 p.m.

"Since I've been here, we've won [the A-10's] for four years in a row, and that's a great accomplishment," Gutridge said. "Now, I think that if we keep playing really well, we can go pretty far."

Should they take the series with Hofstra, the Minutewomen will earn themselves an automatic bid to the NCAA tournament. UMass will look to Gutridge to power their offense. She currently holds a .409 batting average, tops for the team.

"She is an outstanding hitter. she has grown as a hitter since she got here," Sortino said. "She is the go to person in our lineup. Where she's really, really good, and really, really important, and where a lot of people don't notice her is at first base. She takes a lot of bad throws and gets a lot of outs for us."

The Flying Dutchwomen will be a challenge for the Minutewomen. They are the America East Conference champion, and ranked second to UMass in the northeast region.

"I think that we'll do pretty well, it will be a challenge, and they'll be tough to beat, but I think that we will do really well," Gutridge said.

Although UMass is 6–0 in play–in games, they have never faced a team with Hofstra's strength.

"Without a doubt, they will be tougher than anything else we faced in previous years," Sortino said.

Hofstra holds a record of 39–15. The Minutewomen were scheduled to play Hofstra on April 23, but the game was canceled because of inclement weather. Against common opponents, UMass is 10–0, while Hofstra is 11–3.

The Flying Dutchwomen are led by two sophomores, Alicia and Jen Smith (no relation). Jen Smith has a .387 batting average and a .108

Winter ball helps Pudge Rodriguez start season smoldering

By Denne H. Freeman
Associated Press

ARLINGTON, Texas — Ivan Rodriguez wore a big smile as he walked by general manager Doug Melvin.

"I'm still waiting for you to tell me how great winter ball has been for you," Melvin said.

Rodriguez didn't say a word. He just kept smiling, and no wonder.

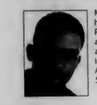
He's leading the major leagues with a .440 average and has been a scourge to those who test his arm, throwing out 9-of-16 would-be stealers.

Rodriguez played in the Puerto Rican winter league this past offseason, a decision that did not sit well with his employer. The six-time Gold Glove catcher had signed a five-year, $42 million contract with the Texas Rangers, and the club felt he risked injury.

Two years ago, the Rangers learned what can happen in such circumstances. Outfielder Juan Gonzalez was playing in Puerto Rico and injured his wrist diving for a ball. He missed the first month of the season.

"It's not that we worry Pudge will get worn out," Melvin said. "It's a worry he could get hurt in a home plate collision. That's what we worry about. He's just rolling the dice on an injury that could endanger his career."

Whatever their concerns the Rangers concede that the hot start by Rodriguez can be attributed to his conditioning when he came to spring training.



"He was sizzling the minute he hit the field in Port Charlotte (Fla.) and he hasn't cooled off yet," Texas first baseman Will Clark said. "He's our most consistent hitter."

Rodriguez was the AL player of the week last week when he hit .520 with five doubles. He was also the AL player of the month. Rodriguez sort of double-crossed the Rangers on the winter ball issue. He said he wouldn't play, so Texas didnt feel inclined to include the clause in his contract.

Former first lady speaks at Mt. Holyoke

Rosalynn Carter spoke yesterday at Mt. Holyoke.

By Albertino Fernandes
Collegian Correspondent

SOUTH HADLEY — Former First Lady Rosalynn Carter addressed an almost packed audience in Chapin Auditorium about her advocacy for mental health. Promoting and taking excerpts from her new book, Helping Someone with Mental Illness: A Compassionate Guide for Family, friends, and Caregivers. This book was a real challenge for her to write because she wanted a book that could be easily understood by everyone. The book steers away from using too many technical terms but is informative about what you need to know about mental illnesses.

The book also talks about some of the major illnesses, treatments and symptoms. It tells you where to find help for your loved one and how to deal with mental illness in your family, where to go for help, what treatments are available and legal issues concerning mental health.

"The more I learned about the issues, the more I learned about the grave need of people suffering from mental illnesses, the more I realized or hoped I could something about it," Carter said, describing how she became involved with the issues about mental health campaign. Her main concern is providing mentally ill people, their families and friends with resources and compassion so that they will be able to live to healthy and happy lives.

Carter is also an advocate for early childhood immunizations, human rights, conflict resolution and empowerment of urban communities

Motorist injured in bus accident

An Amherst resident was hospitalized after driving his moped into a Pioneer Valley Transit Authority (PVTA) bus on North Pleasant Street yesterday afternoon.

Paul Hughes was taken by ambulance to Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton after sustaining injuries from driving into the bus.

"He got some serious leg injuries," said Amherst police Sergeant Scott Livingstone at the scene.

According to the Amherst police, the incident happened at 12:51 p.m. when Hughes tried to pass a mail truck.

"It looks like a gentleman on a moped was travelling southbound [on North Pleasant Street] and went around a large mail truck and didn't see the PVTA," Livingstone said.

The driver of the PVTA bus was not at fault. If charges are filed, they will be against Hughes.

"There are several witnesses. The operator of the PVTA is not at fault. If any charges are filed they would be against the other operator [Hughes]," Livingstone said.

Patrolman Todd Lang will be investigating the incident.

Summit addresses issue of surveillance cameras

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

Safety issues such as the help phones, surveillance cameras in residence halls and the Escort Service were discussed at the Campus Summit on Safety meeting yesterday afternoon.

Installing call boxes and lighting on a trail between Orchard Hill and Sylvan was discussed.

"If you put phones there, then you get into lighting. I think there is a feeling that we don't want to be improving it and by then giving a false sense of security walking through that area," said University of Massachusetts Police Chief John Luippold. "There is a feeling that it's an okay place to walk but it's a very isolated area."

Associate Speaker of the Student Government Association (SGA) Jodi Bailey suggested placing a sign near the walkway alerting students to the danger of the trail.

"At least put a sign up there as a warning," Bailey said. "First semester freshman don't know about [the trail]."

Security cameras were also discussed.

"There was an SGA referendum question [student responses were] saying no way, no how," said Sarah Boy of the Vice Chancellors office-Student Affairs. "There were two house councils willing to do this."

"I still recommend cameras in the lobby of dormitories," Luippold said.

Placing cameras in parking lots was also considered.

"In the yellow lot by Orchard Hill, it feels like you're far away because of the woods and everything. You're not, but it feels like you are," Bailey said.

"I have also tried to cont–out placing cameras in the parking lots. We really are far from that conversation of who will monitor the cameras or if it will be like the library," Luippold said.

"Even if you had a camera trained on a person keying a car you wouldn't see it. But when you've got three drunks that pile out of a car and jump from hood to hood that could be seen," Sergeant Paul Vlach said. "The majority of what we had as police problems in the lots are damage and break– ins to property."

The current Escort Service is a pilot program.

"The pilot program has changed," Luippold said. "The pilot program now has a fixed route. There are a number of places on campus where the van will stop. We have a second van that drives a feeder service in the parking lots."

The Campus Summit on Safety is a group of students and University faculty and staff that meet to discuss issues of physical and personal safety on campus. They work to cause institutional change and increase institutional awareness of safety on campus.

Ross to push for action in Middle East

By Terence Hunt
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — With the clock running on a U.S. ultimatum, President Clinton rushed Mideast envoy Dennis Ross to Israel yesterday to press for a breakthrough on troop withdrawals from the West Bank. Clinton said "very hard decisions" are needed to keep the peace process alive.

In an embarrassment for the White House, Hillary Rodham Clinton said she supports creation of a Palestinian state. Clinton's spokesman said that did not reflect the president's belief that Israel and the Palestinians should resolve the issue themselves. Mrs. Clinton is "free to be as outspoken as she wishes to be," presidential spokesman Mike McCurry said. "That view expressed personally by the first lady is not the view of the president."

Republicans accused the president of bullying Israel and siding with Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat. The White House countered that the GOP was playing politics.

With the peace process stalled for more than a year, the United States created a sense of urgency by demanding that Israel agree to a 13 percent pullback of the West Bank as the price for attending peace talks in Washington beginning Monday.

The U.S. plan would require Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to reverse himself and give up more territory than he has been saying is safe to return to the Palestinians.

As Ross headed for Israel, State Department spokesman James Foley said, "Time is urgent. We regard this as a strategic opportunity not to be missed because the clock is ticking."

The White House said the U.S. terms, announced Tuesday by Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, would not be relaxed.

"Secretary Albright has made clear, and we would reiterate, we are not going to water down our ideas," McCurry said.

Administration officials, however, said Ross would explore with Netanyahu how Israel could meet the U.S. target, suggesting there was flexibility in how to achieve the goal. Foley said Ross would discuss possible "refinements" to break the deadlock and permit the Monday talks to take place.

Amid fresh Republican criticism, Clinton said he was trying simply to regain the momentum that has been lost in the past few months" but "not by imposing our ideas on anyone."

"What we're searching for is common ground to achieve what Prime Minister Netanyahu asked us to pursue a year ago: the start of accelerated permanent status negotiations." Those talks are to deal with the toughest issues: the future of Jerusalem, Jewish settlers, refugees, final borders and Palestinian demands for a state.

"I do not want to minimize the difficulties," Clinton said. "Both sides have to make very hard decisions if we're going to keep moving forward."

From Clinton on down, the administration stressed that it was Netanyahu who asked the United States to support jumping ahead to permanent status negotiations. If Netanyahu balks now, administration officials reasoned, he will have to shoulder the responsibility for prolonging the impasse.

Ariel Sharon, Israel's minister of national infrastructure who is known for his hawkish views, said he could not accept "dictates" when it comes to Israel's "vital security problems." Sharon's comments, at a symposium sponsored by the Washington Institute for Near East Policy, echoed remarks Wednesday by Netanyahu in criticizing the U.S. position.

Foley, the State Department spokesman, said Netanyahu asked Albright by telephone yesterday morning to send Ross to Israel "to bridge the remaining gaps" between Israel and the United States. Ross was to arrive today.

The White House and State Department rejected criticism from House Speaker Newt Gingrich and other Republicans that Clinton was trying to strongarm Israel.

McCurry said the Republicans were "just trying to make politics on everything. And they're not having much luck." McCurry said, "We have no concern whatsoever politically about President Clinton's standing in the American Jewish community. He is considered to be and he is one of the most stalwart supporters the state of Israel has ever had in the American presidency."

Foley rejected the notion that the United States is asking concessions only from Israel. He noted that the U.S. suggestion that Israel surrender 13 per cent of its territory on the West Bank falls far short of Palestinian demands. Nonetheless, he pointed out that Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat has agreed to it.

Disappearances denounced in Mexico

MEXICO CITY (AP) — An "alarming increase" in the number of disappearances in Mexico since 1994 coincides with a government crackdown on rebels and drug trafficking, Amnesty International said yesterday.

The London-based rights group called for "immediate and effective measures to put an end to this deplorable practice," which it said often involves police and army forces.

Authorities have denied responsibility in most of the cases, it said.

During a government crackdown on leftists in the 1970s and early 1980s, hundreds of people — including many political activists and professors — were detained by security forces, the group said. Many were tortured while in captivity; some were never seen again. For more than 20 years, Amnesty International has been calling on the government to resolve more than 1,400 disappearances. After several years in which there were few reported disappearances, the group is again insisting the government act to stop a resurgence. Amnesty said it has seen an "alarming increase" in the number of disappearances since 1994, most of them linked to counterinsurgency operations, especially in the southern states of Guerrero, Oaxaca and Chiapas. Other cases were linked to the anti-drug effort in the northern states of Chihuahua and Sinaloa. It cited a January 1994 case in which dozens of soldiers detained three community leaders in the Chiapas village of Morelia a week after leftist Zapatista rebels took up arms in Chiapas to demand greater Indian rights and democracy. The three men were taken into a church, where they were tortured, their screams heard by villagers, it said.

Inspections of older Boeing 737 ordered

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Federal Aviation Administration today ordered rapid inspections of some older model Boeing 737 aircraft after one such plane was found last week to have holes in a pipe that carries electrical wires through a fuel tank on the wing. FAA and Boeing officials determined that the two pin-sized holes were caused by electrical arcing within that pipe, creating the potential for the type of tank explosion that is suspected of downing TWA Flight 800 off Long Island in July 1996.

The immediate airworthiness directive required compliance within seven days or five flight hours, whichever comes later. The order applies to 152 Boeing 737-100 and -200 models. Repairs that may have to be made could take the plane out of service for 15 hours, which FAA officials conceded could cause some delays to the flying public.

Aviation officials also announced that they were giving the operators of Boeing 747 and 767 aircraft 60 days to do some similar inspections.

Court allows fertilized eggs to be destroyed

By Genaro C. Armas
Associated Press

ALBANY, N.Y. — The fate of a couple's frozen embryos should be decided by the husband and wife who created them — and not by judges — even after the couple divorces, New York's top court ruled yesterday.

In a first-of-its kind case to reach the Court of Appeals, the panel in a 7-0 decision ruled the five eggs from Maureen Kass artificially fertilized by then-husband Steven Kass in 1993 can be donated to research, despite the woman's wish to use them to have children.

The ruling upheld an agreement the Long Island couple signed before completing the in-vitro fertilization process.

"We're bitterly disappointed at this point, Mrs. Kass wanted to have a child," said her lawyer Vincent Stempel.

Steven Kass' attorney did not immediately return phone calls seeking comment.

Courts in various states have been wrestling with the question of frozen embryos and divorce for years. In a 1992 Tennessee case, that state's Supreme Court ruled that the husband's right not to have children outweighed his wife's rights to donate the embryos to an infertile couple.

However, the Tennessee case did not involve a contract signed by husband and wife as the Kass case does, and Maureen Kass' attorney has said it is the first of its kind in the country.

Before going through the procedure, the Kasses signed the contract indicating what they wanted to do with the eggs, known as pre-zygotes, if they did not want to go through with a pregnancy. Such a contract is recommended under voluntary guidelines issued by the American Society for Reproductive Medicine, but not mandated by law.

In the 21-page decision yesterday, Chief Judge Judith Kaye reverted back to that agreement, saying it was a "quintessentially personal, private decision."

while at the Carter Center in Atlanta, Ga., — an organization she founded. Carter performs most of her advocacy at the Center.

The Center participates in annual symposiums that date back to 1984 or 1985. The symposiums which brought together mental health organizations from all over the country to discuss better ways to help people with mental health issues didn't become successful until the 1990s.

"More then 60 organizations during the last five or so years have come together in the Carter Center to discuss issues that were pertinent [to mental heath]," Carter said.

Carter proposed to the need to end stigmatism and discrimination that prevents so many from seeking treatment or even admit having a mental disorder.

"Investing in early intervention is so important," Carter said while giving encouraging advice to people concerned with mental health issues. She urged people to contact their senator or congressman to support laws like Senate Bill 2165 which prevents insurance companies from discriminating against people who suffer from mental disorders. Carter answered questions and signed her book after her speech.

■ eggs

It should be the couple, "not the state and not the courts, who by their prior directive make this deeply personal life choice," Kaye wrote.

The Court of Appeals ruling upheld a lower state appeals court ruling. Originally, a trial judge had ruled in the woman's favor, but that decision had been overturned by the Appellate Division of state Supreme Court.

The Kasses could not have children naturally due to the woman's exposure to the drug DES when her mother was pregnant with her. In 1993, Maureen Kass' sister agreed to be impregnated with one of the artificially-inseminated eggs, but the procedure failed. The couple split up soon afterward. The agreement both had signed implied the fertilized eggs be destroyed and donated to research if both parties did not agree to use them.

The legal wrangling began when Maureen Kass, now 39, argued she never lost hope of having a baby and wanted to use the eggs for implantation. Her husband said he did not want to have a child by his former wife.

The case could have an affect on the estimated 20,000 frozen embryos subject to dispute across the country. In all, there are estimated to be about 100,000 embryos in storage nationwide. The decision will hopefully influence couples going through test-tube fertilization to consider more carefully specific conditions about what they want done with the eggs should they separate, said Dr. Benjamin Younger, executive director of the Birmingham, Ala.-based American Society of Reproductive Medicine.

"When you're sitting there as a couple wanting desperately to have a child, it's hard to think at that time that you're going to get a divorce," Younger said.

Under voluntary guidelines issued by Younger's organization, it is recommended that fertility doctors urge patients to sign such an agreement before proceeding.

But some critics claim those guidelines are ambiguous, and say a standardized pre-procedure contract is needed.

A pioneer bill introduced recently by New York state Sen. Roy Goodman of Manhattan would formalize who gets custody of the embryos in specific cases such as death or divorce, and how they will be used. It would make an agreement between the partners legally binding.

"The [Court of Appeals] ruling is a very wise decision," Goodman said. "It recognizes the fact there should be a clear-cut agreement among spouses.

But the decision will likely not scare away prospective couples from considering in-vitro fertilization, said Dr. Jamie Griffo, director of reproductive endocrinology at New York University Medical Center.

"Nobody goes to in-vitro fertilization thinking they're going to go through a divorce. This is just an unfortunate situation," Griffo said.

"But you can't have somebody becoming an unconsenting parent. That's just not right," he added.

Year 2000 problem still a threat

By Darlene Superville
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Mounting demands on the Internal Revenue Service as it races to solve the year 2000 computer problem are creating a "dangerous and risky situation" for the tax agency, Commissioner Charles O. Rossotti told a House panel yesterday.

Representatives of other federal agencies under jurisdiction of the House Ways and Means oversight subcommittee also testified about efforts to correct the computer glitch caused by many computers' use of two digits for years, such as 98 for 1998. Unless corrected, their inability to distinguish 2000 from 1900 threatens operations in the government as well as in the private sector.

At the IRS, the need to implement hundreds of tax-code changes required by the 1997 tax law are adding to the problem, Rossotti said. Many IRS programmers assigned to the year 2000 problem must pull double-duty to manage the tax-law revisions, he said.

Because of the resulting backlog, Rossotti told the subcommittee, some of the pro-taxpayer provisions of an IRS reform bill nearing Senate passage should be delayed for several years so as not to complicate further the massive computer-reprogramming job already under way.

"Do you have the resources to do all of this stuff?" asked Rep. Jerry Kleczka, (D-Wis).

"We have an extraordinarily thin management structure at the IRS... and we have a lot going," replied Rossotti, former head of a computer consulting firm who took over the IRS last year. "We really cannot cram anything more into this computer system. It's already high-risk."

Rossotti said the IRS also is developing contingency plans and has set a January 1999 deadline for overhauling its systems, to be followed by a full year of testing.

Harris Miller, president of the Information Technology Association of America, urged Congress to heed Rossotti's request to relax some of the timelines in the pending legislation "in order to ensure that our tax collection system is able to operate effectively in the year 2000."

Rep. Nancy Johnson, (R-Conn.), who chairs the subcommittee, said the government has more than 7,850 "mission critical" systems that must function at the turn of the century.

"What has become evident to me is that this is a major management problem with a technical component," she said at the start of the hearing. "Jan. 1, 2000, is a finite date that cannot be missed without affecting millions and millions of Americans."

Clinton scraps plan to visit Ireland

By Robert Burns
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Clinton has decided against visiting Northern Ireland to campaign for a May 22 referendum on an Irish peace accord, but he probably will go afterward, White House officials said yesterday.

The president had considered visiting Belfast in mid-May after attending a summit of industrialized nations in Birmingham, England, but he decided his presence might disrupt the push for approval of the peace pact, White House press secretary Mike McCurry said.

"We decided to keep the focus where it should be — on the work that the leaders of the communities are doing to bring the agreement to their constituencies, to argue its merits, and to make the decision that people freely need to make," McCurry told reporters.

"Our own participation in that discussion would not do anything necessarily to hurt the process," McCurry added, "but would not likely do anything to contribute to a very good and spirited debate that's already under way."

Former U.S. Sen. George Mitchell, the chief architect of the agreement, had urged Clinton to visit Northern Ireland as soon as possible. But the province's main Protestant party, the Ulster Unionists, had advised against it, saying it could be perceived by voters as foreign interference.

The peace accord struck April 10 among eight parties and the British and Irish governments is aimed at ending 30 years of violence in Northern Ireland. The accord requires all the province's paramilitary groups to surrender their arms. If voters in the Irish Republic and Northern Ireland approve, the pact will create a new Northern Ireland administration that cooperates with the Irish Republic in policy-making committees.

Clinton met in the White House yesterday with victims of the sectarian violence in Northern Ireland and announced that his administration remained committed to helping spur Irish economic development.

Afterward, the president issued a written statement describing his meeting with 10 representatives of WAVE Center, a support group for victims of violence in Northern Ireland.

"I was inspired by their courage in rejecting violence and working for lasting peace in a land where people are not labeled by religion or national preference," Clinton said.

James Lyons, Clinton's special adviser on economic issues for Ireland, told reporters after the meeting that a Clinton visit to Belfast and Dublin could have boosted voting in the May 22 referendum, but the president felt it best to keep his distance for now.

Deep thoughts

I have come down with a drastic case of senioritis. Due to this debilitating condition I have found terrible difficulty communicating articulate thoughts, so I'm sorry that I will not be able to write the usual, coherent article you're used to. Instead I offer you some gripes, some of my "Deep Thoughts," if you will. I'm sorry if it's a little disjointed, but so are my thought patterns at the moment. Here's what's on my mind.

Beware of first impressions. A good example: I walk into a class at the beginning of the semester and my professor has a nose ring. You know who you are. While I have nothing against people who pierce their bodies, there was something unusual about a teacher who has a nose ring (the T.A. has a tongue stud). But it made me realize something — soon this will be common.

Jason Eiseman

All the young kids with piercings in their eyebrows, noses, tongues and elsewhere are the future of this country. Maybe that's just what we need. Maybe things will turn around when we see pierced noses and tribal tattoos in Congress. Maybe one day we'll have a president who has a tongue stud — that'll be pretty cool.

Just remember, I think piercings are pretty cool, but employers don't. Or if you don't care you could just say screw 'em.

Welcome to the University of Massachusetts. Welcome to a police state, where thousands of criminal records begin every year. I heard that in an effort to stop student drinking, there will be a new branch of the police department next year, the Thought Police.

Maybe the police should start shutting down every street that has ever had a party. Maybe they should have officers pacing through the dorms, sniffing under doors, searching rooms for alcohol.

Maybe they should stop harassing students.

I've been so out of touch lately, I've been getting all of my news from "The Daily Show." You'd be surprised how much information you can get from this brilliant half-hour show. I love the five questions, and Craig Kilborne is the best anchor on television.

I'm sick of people asking me what I'm going to do after graduation. I know they're just being nice, but I can't stand it anymore. For all of you who might ask me in the next few weeks, here's my plan: Me and my dog, Scooby, are going to rent a van, and travel around the country solving mysteries at amusement parks.

I guess I can stop saving myself for Uma Thurman now or Uma Thurman got married this weekend, so I guess I'm an eligible bachelor again.

I think everyone should give blood at these blood drives on campus. I think it's important to get involved with community service projects. If you have money give money. I don't have money, all I can donate is time and blood, and I don't have any time available right now.

Some people take themselves way too seriously. Everything has to be a war for some people, everything has to be a fight. These are our college years, we should be enjoying them.

A great man once said "Life moves pretty fast. If you don't stop and look around once in awhile, you might miss it." That man was Ferris Bueller.

Save Ferris.

Beware of the Free Masons. For those of you who don't know, the Free Masons are a secret society which goes back hundreds of years. Our forefathers were all Masons. There are Masonic symbols on the back of the dollar bill. The "all- seeing eye," and the pyramid are both masonic symbols. Some people believe Masons assassinated George Washington, replaced him with a look-alike, and that's who actually is on the front of the dollar bill.

I don't know about that, but there's some weird stuff going on the dollar bill.

UMass really does have a lot of opportunities to take advantage of. Get involved — I wish I had sooner. If you don't know what you want to do with your life, don't worry. I'm 22, graduating in a few short weeks, and have no idea what I want to do.

But me and Scooby are going to have a great summer.

Too hot for TV?

Last Friday on the "Howard Stern Show," Jerry Springer boldly stated that he would not change the format of his much ballyhooed television show. This despite the fact that his producers had met with religious leaders in Chicago who angrily opposed what they considered a violence-filled porn fest. This all adds to the latest turmoil surrounding the "Jerry Springer Show," a program which Congress has called a parade of perversity and that the president of ABC has deemed unfit for his network. I guess ABC was okay with unfunny lesbian comedians, but not shows in which people beat the hell out of each other on stage. The latest reports that surfaced on the television show "Extra" say that 16 former Springer guests claim the show is rehearsed and the fights you see are fake. These guests have also signed on with a lawyer who says he has been inundated with offers from a story writer with Hollywood connections. I don't suppose there are any hidden, ulterior motives behind all this. No, of course not. Springer, a former lawyer and also the former mayor of Cincinnati, emphatically denies any wrongdoing by the show. He says that the rules for the show are that guests have to tell the truth (they must sign an affidavit saying that they will) and that producers can not in any way instruct the guests how to act. The producer who may be to blame for all of this nonsense is Norm Lebeau, who, of course, denies ever doing anything wrong. Past guests have cited Lebeau as the conspirator who orchestrates the plot and action for certain shows. Executive producer Richard Dawson said that no one on the show has ever participated in duping anyone and if someone on the staff is found to have done such a thing that they will immediately be fired. I find it very hard to believe that a majority of these fights are rigged after having viewed the television show on a regular basis for the past four years. I've also watched his "Too Hot for TV" videotape (the fastest selling video in America) and two other unreleased Springer tapes which could only be specially purchased if you ordered the first volume. "Too Hot for TV 2" and "Bad Boys and Naughty Girls" are an even better watch than the first tape, and clearly show that fists are substantially landed when they are thrown by Springer's vast cornucopia of deranged guests. Someone may pull a punch occasionally, but a majority of these fights are definitely real and not Don King-esque.

Michael C. Mann

The best part of the controversy is how laid back Jerry Springer is about the whole thing. He insists that people "should relax and stop taking the show so seriously," the same very show which he says is the stupidest on television. No one is watching the show for the future of America, says Springer, and people should just enjoy it for what it is worth. Preach on, Jerry.

If this show has an impact on children, don't kill the messenger, look directly at the parents. If children have such little self-control that viewing a daytime talk show causes a problem, then parents need to step up and take responsibility for the lackluster job they are doing at teaching their children how to act. As for promoting violence, I don't believe "The Jerry Springer Show" does anymore than your everyday evening newscast would. I find it hard to believe that people have nothing better to do with their time than whine and protest about a mentally deficient daytime talk show. This reminds of past controversies surrounding 2 Live Crew and Andrew Dice Clay, when First Amendment haters wanted their CDs pulled off of the shelves. Just like no one is forcing anyone to watch Springer, no one was making these people buy or even listen to these CDs. Plain and simple, if you don't want to hear something, then just don't buy it, and if you don't like a show on television, then change the channel and don't watch it.

How much of an effect will these recent allegations have against the show? The answer will be in the ratings, ratings which consistently rank "The Jerry Springer Show" as the highest rated talk show on television.

Letters to the Editor

Rethinking homelessness

To the Editor:

You know the stereotype — long straggly hair and beard that haven't been cut or cleaned for years, ripped clothes, panhandling and a cardboard box. This is society's view of the typical homeless individual. However, we are writing to prove that this stereotype is not true.

As a group project, we volunteered at the Grove Street Inn in Northampton. After eating a somewhat edible dinner of our own creation, we began to engage in intelligent conversations with the housemates. To our amazement, the average amount of education was the completion of four years of college. One such individual even obtained two masters degrees and is currently working on publishing a book. This goes to show that just because one graduates from college, it doesn't guarantee a secure future.

You are probably asking why then did they end up in a homeless shelter, and we discovered that the reasons are closer to home than one would think. The primary causes that they shared ranged from family break-up, high cost of living, moving away from one's roots, low wage jobs without benefits and the mental stresses that accompany all these. These are fears that we all share, yet most of us have the support systems that we can rely on, where others do not.

We found that these individuals were charming, intelligent, inspirational and most of all real. One such housemate shared with us what they wanted the world to know about homelessness: "The homeless are people, too, that being homeless is a condition and not a label, that being homeless is not a crime, that homelessness can happen to anyone, and that they have rights like anyone else."

Russell Sienkewicz,
Northampton Police Chief, recently offered his feelings on the matter: "It is unfortunate that one bad apple throws a label on everyone. Stereotypes are held by people with no direct contact to these individuals and in turn have very narrow mentalities on these situations."

Now, before you start to stereotype the homeless, remember that the reasons stated are realistic enough for it to happen to you just as another stated: " It can happen to anyone. So before you point a finger or label a person, remember you are a candidate for homelessness. There is a slim line that separates it."

Hillel congratulates SGA

To the Editor:

I wanted to take this opportunity to congratulate the SGA's Ways and Means Committee for the successful passage of the budget act. I know many tensions and emotions were felt throughout the process but in the end I am aware of the vast work of the committee. In particular I wanted to congratulate Seth Avakian, Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, for his fantastic diligence in ironing out an agreeable proposal. I also wanted to thank the entire Senate body, Speaker Cook and Associate Speaker Bailey for allowing us to speak at your meeting. I hope that no ill feelings developed between Hillel's Jewish Student Union and any particular member or members because of any comments.

As an RSO it was necessary for us to let the SGA and the student body know that we were not happy with the budget. We hope that next year we can work with the SGA to appeal the finance committee for additional funding.

Thanks and congratulations once again.

Hope for the future

In trying to keep up with the news of the outside world, I checked out the day's Boston Herald edition. The front page reported that singer Carly Simon is battling breast cancer. That's too bad.

I don't know who she is, but I do know that cancer is not the best thing to have. I wish I could help her.

I feel bad for anyone who has cancer.

I start to read the next article.

What? Oh, no!

Save Mr. T.

Not the famous Mr. T?

Lawrence Tao, the big bad B. A. Barracks from the "A-Team," with the Mohican haircut and big gold chains around his neck, has been diagnosed with cancer. He has a form of lymphoma.

Mr. T became a part of "'80s sitcom era," when he starred as Clabber Lag, Rock's enemy in Rocky III. He also starred in "T. and T.," and the cartoon which ruled my childhood, "Mr. T."

Poor Mr. T.

What is happening to everyone?

They're all dropping like flies because of these annoying diseases.

Every time I pick up a newspaper, some of the greatest athletes, actors, politicians and music stars are all headlined from suffering, and then eventually dying from lethal diseases such as cancer and AIDS.

Will someone save them? I'm tired of reading about it.

The news of Ervin Magic Johnson being infected with HIV just hit the roof all around the world, as did Tommy Gun's announcement of also being infected with the HIV. Great baseball star Mickey Mantle died of cancer. Mario Lemieux and Nancy Reagan are unfortunately living with the disease. And who can forget about mellow reggae singer Bob Marley? He died of cancer as well.

Millions of people all around the world are dying and suffering from diseases that cannot be cured. It's hard to think that they are all just sitting ducks with no way to recover.

So with my thought, I look past the Carly Simon story, cried over the Mr. T story and then kept reading.

"The Hundred Club honors one of its own." No thanks, I'll skip that article. "GOP hits bricks for signatures." Um, maybe I'll read that story later.

A couple of pages later I read "Government may rush testing of two tumor-shrinking drugs."

What?

Save Mr. T.

The article (Boston Herald, May 6, page 8) said that experiments in eradicating tumors in laboratory mice were successful.

Miltom Valencia

Dr. Judah Folkman tested this theory by injecting mice with tumors with angiostatin and endostatin.

When the drugs were injected, cancer cells shrank to microscopic proportions and lay inactive. There were no other tumors found on the mice. They were left healthy.

Yet no testing has been done on humans, even though some cancer experts look at the discovery as a possible cancer cure.

The article said that human experiments with the drugs could begin within three to four months instead of the minimum year waiting period for new medications.

Furthermore, I sit here reading more and more stories about people contracting these diseases and not about people's tumors being shrunk.

If the drugs mentioned are a definite cure, millions of people all over will finally be relieved of their diseases. Why wait? Let's get working.

Dr. John Holaday, EntreMed president and chief executive officer has said, "We don't want to make false hopes or projections we can't keep."

Well I don't think that someone dying and suffering from the disease would refuse anything that at least had a small chance at saving their life. It couldn't make things any worse.

The government should allow the testing to occur immediately and patients who will die in a short period of time anyway can at least have one last hope. If the medicine can actually eliminate a mouse's tumor, it should at least be a last resort to save someone from suffering.

We can't bring Bob Marley back, but we can at least try to save the hopeful Bob Marley of the future, before he dies in two months.

If he will die anyway, why not take an edge, try the medicine right away? There's nothing you can lose.

Cats on the prowl at Mullins

Cats, the longest running Broadway musical in history will hit the Mullins Center this weekend. Surpassing the previous record holder A Chorus Line, which stood strong at 6,137 consecutive shows, Cats has been said to have been one of the first mega-musicals of the '80s, which were responsible for revitalizing the slumping Broadway reputation.

The combined touring company of Cats (1 through 4) broke the record for the longest continuously-touring show several years ago.

The First National Touring Company opened Dec. 21, 1985 in Boston and went on to perform in Washington, Philadelphia, Chicago, Denver, San Francisco and Detroit before closing Nov. 8, 1987.

The Second National Touring Company ran from Jan. 7, 1985 through Nov. 8, 1986 in Los Angeles at the Shubert Theatre.

The Third National Touring Company opened Sept. 11, 1986 in West Point and toured the country through Nov. 4, 1988.

Now, the Fourth National Touring Company is setting their own records, breaking the records set by the original tour of Oklahoma! to become the longest running individual touring company in history at 10 years, six months and two weeks.

Overcoming Jesus Christ Superstar's record run of 3,357 performances, in 1989, the original production of Cats became the longest-running musical in the history of the British Theatre.

There have been over 200 performers who have played various roles in the show over the past 10 years. There have been 12 Rum Tum Tuggers and Bustopher Jones/Asparagus/Growltigers, 11 Munkustraps and 61 standbys. Six women have played the role of Grizabella, made famous by the show's hit "Memory."

Because Cats is well know for its large and spectacular set, it will be interesting to see the transformation of the Mullins Center into the famous feline den.

Cats opens tonight at 8 p.m., with additional performances tomorrow and Sunday at 2 p.m. and 7:30 p.m. both days. So be sure to check out this audience pleaser, which has been seen by more than eight million people in New York alone, is sure to leave the crowds in Amherst purring for more.

Bellamy & Winslow to perform

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

As a co-production effort by Something Every Friday (SEF) and University Productions and Concerts (UPC), MTV's Bill Bellamy and Police Academy's Michael Winslow will perform at the University of Massachusetts Fine Arts Center this evening at 8 p.m.

The event is a part of the "Final Four: Exit Laughing Comedy Series" to kick-off the end of the school year.

Michael Winslow, the wierd and wacky "Officer Larvelle Jones" from the Police Academy film series is now performing nationwide for colleges exclusively in part of Funny Business on Campus. Known as the master of "vocal gymnastics," he can imitate over 1,000 vocal impressions and now brings his high-energy show to UMass.

Winslow has also been featured in films such as Cheech and Chong's Next Movie and Nice Dreams, Mel Brooks' Spaceballs, Baywatch Nights and The Academy Awards. He has also been played a guiding role behind the scenes as the voice of "Stripe" in Gremlins and when Michael J. Fox does his little dance in Back To The Future 3, it is Winslow's voice you hear doing the foot shuffles. This doesn't even include his various television appearances with the "Tomorrow Show," "David Letterman," "Arsenio Hall," "Larry King" and "Regis and Kathie Lee."

Winslow said that he does a lot of interviews, but his shows are "entertainment-based" porgrams.

"When you come to my show you might see Jimi Hendrix come back to life for a moment. I've got a whole sound library of things," Winslow said in a press release.

Winslow grew up in a military family and as a child he entertained a lot of students and teachers. After having revealed his talent, Winslow started to perform to larger groups and then nationally. He says that he has learned to save his voice for his "imitations." However, all of his shows are more variety based, and he adds liveliness to his comedy with sound. One of his favorite acts is adding caricature to the entire O.J. Simpson trail — "right down to judge Ito being the Tasmanian Devil," said Winslow.

Currently the host of MTV's hit video/interview show, MTV Jams, Bill Bellamy is the comedian choice for baby boomers with his famous tag line, "I'm in the hoooouse." His recent Showtime special, "Booty Call," was the networks highest rated special in the last two years.

COURTESY SOMETHING EVERY FRIDAY (SEF)

MTV's Bill Bellamy (pictured) and Michael Winslow of the Police Academy movies promise to yuk it up at the Fine Arts Center tonight at 8 p.m. Admission for UMass students is only $3 with ID.

In growing up, Bellamy's early years revolved around Big Wheels and Saturday morning cartoons. He discovered his knack for comedy when he decided to enter a male pageant show. Participants of the pageant had to showcase a certain talent. Knowing only how to make people laugh, Bellamy came up with a comedy routine and won first prize in the pageant.

"The things I talk about in my comedy are my experiences," Bellamy said in a press release. "I don't make a conscious effort to do a certain kind of comedy. I just do what I know."

His past experiences include a national debut appearance on "Showtime at the Apollo," "The Arsenio Hall Show," "Young Commedians' Special" and is now the current host of "MTV JAMS."

"Hosting JAMS is a dream come true," Bellamy said. "I've already achieved all my personal goals, so anything else is a plus."

Tickets are on sale and on a general seating basis, and they are limited. Admission is $3 for UMass students and $10 for general public. Call the FAC box office at 545-2511 for purchase or ticket information.

They Might Be playing in Noho

They Might Be Giants help re-open Pearl Street with a foot stompin' all ages show tonight in the main ballroom (upstairs).

By Kevin Monahan
Collegian Staff

They Might Be Giants have established themselves as one of those bands that do not have to release any new material at all to maintain their popularity. The two Johns — Linnell and Flansburgh could easily make a living touring using all of the old material from their six LPs which they have released every two years since 1986. As part of the grand re-opening lineup at Pearl Street, Linnell, Flansburgh and company are gracing the area tonight to promote the release of an upcoming live album. In their live performances, They Might Be Giants radiate the kind of energy that can only be described as a caffeine rush — it's fast paced, jumpy, erratic and all-around fun.

Originally hailing from Lincoln, Ma., Linnell (keyboards/vocals) and Flansburgh (guitars/vocals) got their start as a band in Brooklyn, NY. Through Dial-a-Song, they quickly developed a cult following and shortly thereafter released their first album They Might Be Giants. It did not take long for the singles "Don't Let's Start" and "She Was a Hotel Detective" to become phenomenonally successful and the video for "Don't Let's Start" to gain MTV airplay. In 1988, Lincoln widened their fan base even further and produced the hit single "Ana Ng" which became a "120 Minutes" classic.

The success of their two LPs and constant touring contributed to TMBG's immensely accumulating popularity, which reached its pinnacle in 1990 with the release of their best selling third album Flood. The hits "Istanbul (Not Constantinople)" and the college party favorite "Birdhouse In Your Soul" helped make They Might Be Giants one of the most interesting and offbeat bands in existence outside the mainstream. Soon thereafter came the release of 1992's Apollo 18 featuring "The Guitar," and the 1993 EP Why Does the Sun Shine?

1994 proved to be a turning point in the band's career, as Linnell and Flansburgh inducted drummer Dan Hickey and bassist Hal Cragin — whom TMBG has been touring with since 1992 — as official band members. John Henry, the first album recorded with the full band, was a change in direction for They Might Be Giants, as John Henry deviated from the usual chirpy, bouncy and nasal style that characterized their earlier work. Factory Showroom (1996) marked a return to form for the band, featuring more of the insanely catchy tunes that won the band their acclaim.

Separately, both John Linnell and John Flansburgh have worked on side projects — Linnell working with the Jon Spencer Blues Explosion and Frank Black, and Flansburgh working with a band called Mono Puss, whose first album, Unsupervised, was released in 1996.

Altogether, They Might Be Giants have sold over two million albums, and have played over 1,000 shows. Tonight will be the second time they have played Pearl Street this school year. Seeing a They Might Be Giants live show, complete with horn sections, accordions, dancing, pogo-ing and conga lines is a good time had by all.

Forget Dafoe, Bruins need Carey to compete for Cup

Paul Teves

What a season for the Boston Bruins. Jason Allison, Sergei Samsanov, Anson Carter, even Ted Donato and Steven Hlenze played well. Maybe Dimitri Kristich wasn't as bad a deal for superman kozef Stumpel.

Well, yeah, it was a bad trade, after all we got Byron Dafoe.

For some reason at the beginning of season, the Bruins decided to replace former Vezina Trophy winner Jim Carey with the unproven Byron Dafoe. Well, isn't that cute.

Dafoe played reasonably well all season, and the play of the forwards and older defensemen helped Dafoe through a good season.

But when the chips were down, Dafoe couldn't come through, just like I said he wouldn't. Let's face it, the Capitals are old and really shouldn't have won the series. Esa Tikkanen, Brian Bellows, Mark Tsinordi, how old is he? What about Adam Oates and Joe Juneau, they're old as well.

Let's overlook the fact that the Bruins were robbed like the National Democratic Headquarters during Watergate on the Timmy Taylor in the crease play in game three, but Dafoe still struggled.

He had one good game in the series, the fifth game. In that game "Lord Byron," as he is affectionately called, stopped all 26 shots, which were put to him.

I don't disagree that Dafoe has moments of brilliance. I just doubt that he can lead a team to a Stanley Cup.

It takes a solid goalie to lead a team to the pinnacle of this sport. The most recent example is last year's Philadelphia Flyers, who had a great team and made it to the Cup finals but didn't have the hot goalie like the Red Wings did. So the Flyers lost.

This year the Flyers are already playing golf, after losing in six to Buffalo, which has a pretty good goalie named Dominik Hasek.

Dafoe's biggest problem is that he looks very uncomfortable in goal. He seems nervous all the time, and kind of like he doesn't belong there. That's because he doesn't.

He belongs on the bench in the playoffs. I was so uncomfortable watching Dafoe at times that I wished the Bruins would give Robbie Tallas a shot. That's pretty bad.

Okay, so maybe Dafoe should be our back-up, but who should play goal? Jim Carey, welcome back. Here is a guy who can get hot and lead a team to a cup. He can't complain about the defense any more the way Bill Ranford did. He should be able to win games if Dafoe could, so let's get him back in the mix.

Give him incentives to win hockey games and I bet you he gets hot again, and then maybe when this great young hockey club gets to the playoffs next year, it will not have to lose to a bunch of old men like the Caps.

Maybe Harry Sinden will address these issues in the off season, along with drafting a goalie and some young defenseman to learn from our aging defense. He should work on getting the future of the team — Jim Carey — back into game shape and ready for next year's opener.

This would be more effective than going on national television after game three and trashing the best young players on the team.

I would rather have Allison and Carter than Rick Tochett and Ranford any day.

Paul Teves is a Collegian staff member.

an impressive .362 batting average. Leftfielder Aaron Braunstein, the steal-fast producer from leftfield, has driven in 21 runs and tips the scales with a .311 batting average. Matt Wolcott and first baseman Bryan Mazzaferro combine for 44 RBI. Sophomore Steve Asadoorian has been the utility player this season, batting .403 in 23 games with one homer and 17 RBI while filling in at left field and third base. Besides hitting .312 with 21 RBI, catcher Brian Samela has been a consistent wall behind home plate, catching all 38 games.

Aside from their talent at the plate, UMass pitching has been consistently holding the reins on the mound. Bill Cooke, who has the go-ahead to pitch today, has been a mainstay. The lefthander leads the team with an 8-1 record including a perfect 6-0 in the A-10. His opponents are averaging just under two runs per game as he has racked up 46 Ks. The junior is 2-0 in his career versus the Hokies, allowing just one run in 11 innings.

Ryan Cameron has adapted well from his relieving to starting position this season. Hurling six consecutive games, the junior posts a 5-3 record in nine starts. The return of senior Scott Barnsby from tendinitis has been key for UMass at the end of the regular season. Since his comeback, he has pitched 16 innings while allowing just six earned runs on 10 hits.

inning. Freshman third baseman Annie Smith was walked by Hofstra's Smith and junior Katie Kenderski, who was subbed in as a pinch runner, scored on Kiely Scofield's double.

The Minutewomen had a tougher time getting started in the second game, which remained scoreless until the fourth inning. Kenderski pinch ran for Cutridge after the first baseman's single to right field, and stole second on the next pitch. Buckley was walked and junior Becky George earned the RBI with a single to center field. Kenderski managed to outrun the throw and avoided the catcher with a backdoor slide. George later scored on an unearned run after Scofield reached first on a bases-loaded error by the first baseman.

The win was the 19th straight for UMass, now the team hopes its record earned the opportunity to host the NCAA Regionals.

"I think we have a great chance. We are the No. 1 team in the Northeast and I think we deserve the chance to be at home," Sortino said.

The Daily Collegian would like to extend a warm hug to You! Yes you..for reading all sections of the Collegian, including comics.

Draft will be different for Cs

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

BOSTON — The Boston Celtics, who built their current nucleus through the last two NBA drafts, don't expect this year's to produce as much.

The Celtics are likely to get the 10th choice in the draft lottery scheduled for May 17 and could end up packaging it and one of their current players in a trade, coach Rick Pitino said yesterday.

"I would be very excited with the first, second or third pick," he said during his first meeting with reporters since the team ended its third straight season without a playoff berth. "Whether I would be [excited] about the 10th pick, I'm not sure."

Teams getting the first three picks in the June 24 draft will be determined during the lottery in which 1,000 combinations of numbers ranging from one through 14 will be assigned to 13 non-playoff teams.

The worse a team's record, the more chances it has. Boston had only the 10th worst record and has just a 2.01 percent chance of getting the first pick, 1.14 of getting the second and 1.90 of getting the third. The order of selection for teams which do not get one of the top three picks will be determined by inverse order of their regular-season records.

In 1996, Boston had the sixth choice and took Antoine Walker. Last year it had the third and sixth and chose guards Chauncey Billups and Ron Mercer. Billups later was traded to Toronto for Kenny Anderson.

Walker made the Eastern Conference All-Star team this season and Anderson and Mercer form a strong backcourt. Pitino would like any players he adds to provide points and shooting accuracy, regardless of the position.

"To bring in a defensive shot blocker who can't score would hurt this team," he said.

Walker, who led Boston with 22.4 points and 10.2 rebounds per game, can become a free agent after next season.

"We all want Antoine to be a Celtic. He has great upside. He wants to be a Celtic," Pitino said. "I think it will all work out."

UMass softball wins play–in to advance to NCAAs

JORMA KANSANEN / COLLEGIAN

The Massachusetts softball team is heading for another run at the NCAAs now that it has defeated Hofstra in a play–in doubleheader. UMass took yesterday's contests, 4–0 and 3–0.

Hofstra can't solve Henderson or Galas

By Jackie Leroux

HEMPSTEAD, N.Y. — The No. 21 Massachusetts softball team took another step toward its goal of returning to the Women's College World Series yesterday with a 4–0, 3–0 sweep of Hofstra in the NCAA play–ins.

The Minutewomen earned themselves an automatic berth into the NCAA tournament.

Massachusetts	4
Hofstra	0

"Taking two games from a team like this down here was a very, very tough feat for this team," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said. "This was a full–blown World Series experience as far as I was concerned."

Massachusetts	3
Hofstra	0

UMass will now advance to the NCAA Regionals on May 15–17. The site of the Regionals and the Minutewomen's opponents will be announced Sunday.

Junior pitcher Danielle Henderson pitched two solid shutouts for UMass. She totaled 12 strikeouts in the first game and nine in the nightcap.

It was more than Henderson's play, however, that factored in for UMass. Due to her widely–held reputation as a top pitcher, many of the Hofstra batters found themselves too tense to hit against her.

"I think we kind of psyched ourselves out knowing that it's [Henderson]," freshman shortstop Lindsay Sawyer said. "Just knowing that she's from UMass and that she's such a good pitcher."

Hofstra pitcher Jen Smith, a sophomore, could only get one strikeout in the first game and three in the second. She gave up a total of 13 hits to Henderson's eight.

"I didn't think she was that bad, all she did was work the count in and out," junior second baseman Mandy Galas said.

In the first game, the Minutewomen jumped on the board early, scoring a run in the first inning. Galas started things off with a single to left field and senior Tracey Osier followed with a bunt single, advancing Galas to second. Senior Kim Gutridge hit a sacrifice bunt to put Galas into scoring position.

Senior Kelly Buckley, who made her return to catcher after injuring her thumb, gained the RBI score Galas.

The Flying Dutchwomen made a threat in the third inning. Junior second baseman Dana Bennett hit a double to left field and advanced to third when Buckley dropped the ball. Freshman Lameka Anderson was walked, but the three following Hofstra batters could not come up with an RBI.

"We just couldn't get the key hit today, and that's the nature of the game," Hofstra coach Bill Edwards said. "If you can't get a key hit, you're not going to win."

The Minutewomen attacked again in the bottom of the fifth. Once again, Galas war the key, hitting a single to left field and moving to second on the left fielder's error. Osier bunted a single to advance Galas to third base, and Gutridge had a sac fly to right for the RBI. Osier moved to third on Gutridge's hit and scored with an RBI single from Buckley.

UMass would score the final run of the game in the sixth

In spite of the difficult weather conditions which caused the delay and possible cancellation of four games this week, the Massachusetts baseball team are set to begin the opening round of the Atlantic 10 tournament today in Boyertown, PA.

Earning the No. 1 seed in the East with an in–conference record of 15–3, the Minutemen (27–11) face the No. 2 seed in the West, Virginia Tech (27–21–2), today at 4 p.m. The twilight game will be between the No. 1 seed in the West, George Washington, and the No. 2 seed in the East, Fordham.

Last year, UMass fell to the Hokies in the final, 13–8. VA Tech leads the all–time series 5–4, taking three of their wins last season. This year they compiled a 10–5 record in the conference to qualify for the tournament.

"This is everything we have prepared for since September," coach Mike Stone said. "Hopefully we are well ready."

The Hokies carry a strong offensive storm in Matt Griswold. He headlines the team with 63 RBI and a torrid .371 batting average. The junior is tied for the team–lead in homers with nine. Eric Shiflett joins him atop the team charts with a batting average of .378, complete with two home runs and 23 RBI. Their teammate, Barry Gauch, bats .319 while driving 44 runs in.

Virginia Tech's pitching staff is a mix of youth and experience. Senior Jon Hand has earned an 8–2 record with 67 strikeouts. Freshman Pat Pinkman has struck out 79 batters while compiling a team–leading 3.73 ERA.

The Minutemen's strength is in their hitting. They are 10–0 this season when they score 10 or more runs or lead after the sixth inning.

The leadoff hitter, Shaun Skeffington, tied the UMass regular single–season record for doubles with 19 this past weekend. The sophomore ranks second in the A–10 and ninth in the nation in doubles per game. He is also second on the team with 13 stolen bases. The rest of the lineup follows closely in his base–path–beaten footsteps.

Muchie Dagliere, Doug Clark and Pete Gautreau, the 3–4–5 hitters, combine with a .394 batting average. The trio has belted 19 homers and driven in almost half of the total offense with 133 RBI. Dagliere set the single–season record with 31 straight games with a base hit. Gautreau, a two–time A–10 Baseball Player of the Week, has been a constant threat on the basepaths, stealing a team–leading 17 times.

The bottom of the order has also consistently come through. Junior shortstop Seth Kaplan has compiled

Auckland suffers major power outage

AUCKLAND, New Zealand — A power failure blacked out downtown in New Zealand's largest city again yesterday, a month and a half after it endured five weeks of power cuts due to cable failures.

A fire in a cable was the culprit in the latest outage in Auckland, unrelated to the series of power cable failures that dimmed downtown from in February and March.

Mercury Energy spokeswoman Diane Miller said she thought the fault this time occurred in a joint in the cable, but engineers were working to determine the exact cause.

Sunday's 50–minute blackout was more extensive than the earlier mishaps, angering many businesses after knocking out power to a major commercial strip and the central business district.

"They told us there was no risk," said Michael Barnett, chief executive of the Auckland Regional Chamber of Commerce.

"If, because of the loss of one cable, we're sitting in an era of risk again it gets back to an issue of Mercury's credibility," he said.

KKK protestors spark riot in Ann Arbor

ANN ARBOR, Mich.— Police in riot gear used tear gas on anti–Klan demonstrators who broke through a fence and tossed bottles and rocks in an attempt to disrupt a Ku Klux Klan rally Saturday.

At least five people were treated for minor injuries, but no arrests were made.

Hoping to avoid the violence of a similar 1996 Klan rally, the city set up a separate fenced area for the Klan, outfitted police with gas masks and handheld metal detectors and trained more than 100 volunteers to roam the crowd to keep the peace.

Hundreds of counter–demonstrators showed up, many flashing signs reading "Smash the Klan."

While the Klan members were in front of City Hall, the anti–Klan protesters broke through the fence behind the building and threw rocks and bottles, breaking eight windows but coming nowhere near the Klan members.

Police Chief Carl Ent said volunteers did a good job of keeping the angry crowd away from the 37 Klan members, who rallied for about an hour, playing music and making speeches. Several times they shouted "white power" and raised their hands in the Klan salute.

Jamal Benin, 24, said he was yelling at Klan members when the tear gas wafted his way.

Engineering student to speak at commencement

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

Senior industrial engineering major Jean Marie Maranville has been selected as student speaker for the 128th University of Massachusetts undergraduate commencement, which is scheduled for 10:30 a.m., May 24 at the Warren P. McGuirk Stadium.

Maranville will discuss the value of knowledge which she describes as "the life skills that we have acquired through our academic studies, extracurricular activities and most importantly from our personal interactions with one another."

While attending UMass for the past four years, graduating seniors have realized their need for each other, while at the same time becoming independent, Maranville said.

"The primary focus of our education has been the development of the tools necessary to learn which continues throughout our lives in everything we do," Maranville said.

Maranville has participated in various activities during her time at UMass. She was president of the UMass chapters of Alpha Pi Mu, the industrial engineering honors society, and IIE, the Institute of Industrial Engineers. She is also a member of the Society of Women Engineers and chairman of SHOUT, the student high school outreach program.

In addition to her extracurricular activities, Maranville has also earned many awards. She is the recipient of a 1998 Senior Leadership Award and has received five different engineering awards.

Maranville also played the flute as a member of the Minuteman Marching Band and the University Concert Band.

She was chosen as student speaker by a committee of four seniors and three faculty members. Maranville will work as a quality engineer for the Gillette Company in South Boston beginning in June.

Riots rage as bishop is laid to rest

By Munir Ahmed
Associated Press

FAISALABAD, Pakistan — A mob of Muslim extremists burned homes and shops in a Christian neighborhood in northeastern Pakistan yesterday while 10,000 mourners buried a bishop who killed himself to protest religious discrimination.

Christian residents then attacked some police for not responding quickly enough to the raid. After black plumes of smoke from the burning buildings filled the air, riot police used tear gas to disperse the crowds, then arrested 16 Muslim militants and five Christians. Three people were reported injured.

Roman Catholic Bishop John Joseph, a noted human rights campaigner, killed himself last week to protest the death sentence given to a Christian accused of insulting Islam.

The suicide has prompted violent protests by Christians and Muslims divided over Pakistan's blasphemy laws, which call for the death penalty for insulting Islam or its prophet, Mohammed. While Joseph's body was being buried on the sprawling grounds of Faisalabad's Cathedral of Saints Peter and Paul, about 500 Muslim extremists rampaged through the nearby Christian neighborhood, screaming slogans in favor of the blasphemy laws.

"I begged them not to burn my children," wailed Parveen Massih. She sat in the remains of her home, her head buried in her hands.

"They tore my clothes and they said, 'We are going to set your children on fire'."

Her neighbor George Massih, lost his one–story brick home after the mob doused it in kerosene and set it on fire.

"They even took my bible and set it on fire," he said. The gates of Faisalabad's cathedral were manned by armed Christian volunteers.

"The blood of Bishop Joseph will pave the way for a revolution," read a banner. Joseph was chairman of a human rights commission established by the Catholic Bishops Conference of Pakistan.

A Christian lawmaker, Johnson Michael, accused Pakistan's government of bowing to Islamic extremists and demanded the repeal of the blasphemy law.

Also Sunday, about 1,500 Christians marched through the southern port city of Karachi, setting several shops and vehicles on fire and shouting protests against the law.

There are two million Christians in Pakistan, but most of the country's 140 million people are Muslim.

Ayub Massih, the Christian sentenced to death, remains in jail pending appeal. He was accused of speaking favorably of Salman Rushdie, who has lived in seclusion since Iranian religious leaders sentenced him to death for his allegedly blasphemous novel, "The Satanic Verses."

Several Christians have been sentenced to death under Pakistan's blasphemy law, but the convictions were overturned by higher courts.

There are dozens of people awaiting trial on blasphemy charges.

Boeing 737 models grounded

By Glen Johnson
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The government yesterday grounded older models of the Boeing 737, the world's most popular jet, after mandatory inspections of some aircraft found extensive wear in power lines running through their wing fuel tanks.

The order affected 15 percent of the 737s operating domestically, causing flight cancellations as the business week began.

The emergency inspection, the broadest FAA order for commercial aircraft since McDonnell–Douglas DC–10s were grounded in 1979, came three days after the Federal Aviation Administration gave airlines up to a week to inspect their oldest 737s for signs of wear in the wiring or the pipes that carry the wires through the fuel tanks. A recent inspection of a Continental Airlines 737 found both exposed wires and holes in the piping believed to have been caused by electrical sparks. Officials feared the mixture of fuel, air and electricity could spark an explosion such as that which downed TWA Flight 800.

By Saturday afternoon, 13 more aircraft had been inspected and mechanics found chafing in half of the bundles examined. One wiring bundle in a United Airlines 737 showed signs of sparking in one spot and a second area where the wires had been worn bare, most likely from vibration over the plane's 50,000 hours in flight. That prompted the FAA to revise its original order, ordering all Boeing 737–100 and –200 series aircraft immediately out of passenger service until they could be inspected and repaired. The planes have cigar–shaped engines mounted directly under their wings. There are 179 such aircraft operated by U.S. carriers. The FAA also ordered inspections over the next two weeks for 737s with between 40,000 and 50,000 flight hours, generally the newer generation Boeing 737–300, –400 and –500 aircraft. Those models have oval–shaped engines mounted on pylons that extend in front of the wings. There are 118 such planes in the United States and 282 worldwide.

Based on the early inspections, the FAA also allowed airlines to discontinue inspections of another set of pipes and wires leading to the aircraft's center fuel tank. In all 13 aircraft inspected, there were no signs of chafing found in that wiring.

"While we are concerned about (the inspections) and the disruption it may have on the system, the No. 1 concern of the FAA is safety," said Thomas McSweeny, the Anti–Semitism at UM decreased according to recent campus survey

By Bryan Schwartzman
Collegian Staff

There is an overall decrease in anti–Semitism at the University of Massachusetts, according to a draft report of a survey conducted by the Student Affairs Research, Information and Systems (SARIS) for the Office of Human Relations.

SARIS conducted the survey on Nov. 12, 1997, interviewing 379 self–identified Jewish students as a sample of the larger community. Currently, SARIS is comparing the data with similar surveys conducted in 1991 and 1994.

The results reveal the environment for Jewish students is improving, but a range of anti–Semitic behavior is still experienced.

According to the survey draft, "...the most common [instances of anti–Semitism] are stereotyping and "put–down" jokes from other students, anti–Semitic graffiti, and de–faced Jewish activity posters."

Grant Ingle, Director of the Office of Human Relations said these the same problems experienced by other minority communities on campus, including the ALANA (Asian, Latino, African and Native American) and GLBT (Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual and Transgender) communities.

"The way to approach these problems is through collaboration," Ingle said.

According to Ingle, there are a only a handful of universities which poll students to the extent UMass does.

"An institution can take an issue, document it, and do things about it," Ingle said.

Ingle began commissioning surveys of this kind in the early 1980's concerning issues of sexual harassment. The results of the surveys helped Ingle create programs which created more awareness toward sexual harassment. The result was a 25 percent drop in sexual harassment between the 1983 and 1989, according to the surveys.

Ingle said surveys regarding anti–Semitism conducted in the 1980's, including questions and the data–analysis, have been refined in the 1990's.

The Office of Human Relations has worked with the Office of Jewish Affairs, which was created in 1994, to educate the campus community through programs and seminars about issues of anti–Semitism.

According to the survey draft, "a comparison incorporating the 1991 and 1994 results shows statistically significant decreases in stereotyping behaviors by students and by University staff, in the defacing of Jewish activity posters, in threatening or derogatory calls or mail, in hearing negative remarks about Jewish people going unchallenged by class instructors, and in harassment of students by students."

According to the survey, Hillel House was the most likely place for students to bring concerns of anti–Semitic harassment. The Office of Jewish Affairs was intentionally omitted as one of the choices for this question.

Presidential election in Paraguay has begun peacefully

By Bill Cormier
Associated Press

ASUNCION, Paraguay — The party that has ruled Paraguay for half a century faced a referendum on its staying power yesterday, beset by a strong opposition challenge as voters elected a president.

Voting began without incident yesterday across this poor South American country of four and a half million people. It marked the start of Paraguay's first peaceful transition from one civilian president to another.

"Everything is calm, very calm" said Raul Cubas Grau, a 54–year–old engineer representing the right–wing Colorado Party, which has ruled uninterrupted in Paraguay since 1947.

The party, which has governed through decades of dictatorship and subsequent democracy, appears to be facing a serious challenge yesterday.

Recent polls have been divided, with only 2 or 3 percentage points the difference between the two top candidates.

The winner will succeed President Juan Carlos Wasmosy, himself the civilian successor in 1993 to an army general who led Paraguay out of Gen. Alfredo Stroessner's 35 years of military rule. Cubas faced Domingo Laino Figuerdo, the 62–year–old leader of the opposition Democratic Alliance. Laino ran unsuccessfully for president twice and was detained repeatedly for resisting Stroessner's dictatorship—one of Latin America's longest running—which ended in February 1989.

"I have great confidence in a victory by the Alliance and a clean election," said Laino as he voted, referring to electoral reforms that made the vote count independent.

About 2 million voters were registered to choose a president and vice president, 125 members of the legislature and the nation's 17 governors.

Long lines formed at many of the more than 10,000 polling stations nationwide before the afternoon siesta.

Rodolfo Antola, an 80–year–old Paraguayan who voted for the opposition, said he was tired of the Colorado Party.

"We need change," he added. "Yes, we need change. The Colorados represent a return to the past."

But many still see the Colorado Party as their party for life. "I am not political at all but the Colorado Party is my party. They are the party that cares for the poor and they will work for us," said Catalino Castillo, 50, whose home near the polling station was flooded in March by the Paraguay River.

"My home is now under water and only the Colorado candidates came to us," she said. "They brought us milk and sugar for the children."

Originally the vice presidential nominee, Cubas assumed the Colorado presidential candidacy of former army Gen. Lino Oviedo, who won that party's September 1997 primary.

Last month, Paraguay's Supreme Court upheld a 10–year sentence Oviedo was given by a military court on charges he rebelled against Wasmosy in April 1996.

Oviedo denies he resisted a presidential order to resign as army chief of staff despite a day–long standoff. He remains jailed at a capital army base.

Boeing

FAA's director of aircraft certification.

Boeing supported the action, which followed its own service bulletin to aircraft owners on April 24.

"We're doing everything we can to minimize any schedule disruptions to affected 737 operators and we will continue working with the FAA to monitor the inspection results and take any other action that may be advisable," said Boeing spokesman Russ Young. The manufacturer said it was rushing repair kits to the airlines.

The National Transportation Safety Board, which investigates airline accidents, commended the FAA for taking "aggressive" action to identify and eliminate one of the dangers identified during the investigation into TWA Flight 800—potential ignition sources that could spark a fuel tank explosion.

"The FAA is to be congratulated for its swift action," NTSB Chairman Jim Hall said in a statement yesterday.

Southwest Airlines, United and US Airways were most affected. Southwest has an all-737 fleet, though only about 35 of its aircraft were the type covered by the grounding. The inspections took three-person teams about six hours for each plane, a spokeswoman said.

United had to cancel 54 flights on Sunday as its 18 older-model planes were inspected, but the airline said it would have all the planes back in the air by today.

"This is not impeding our operation anywhere near the level a severe weather condition would at Denver or O'Hare," said United spokeswoman Mary Jo Holland, referring to the airline's two major hub airports.

A US Airways spokesman said his airline had to pull four planes out of service.

Investigators still do not know what caused TWA Flight 800, a Boeing 747, to explode off Long Island in July 1996. They suspect fumes in the center fuel tank were ignited by electricity. Since then, they have been examining the wiring configurations on similar planes and ordering inspections.

Last week, the FAA ordered inspections for Boeing 747 and 767 aircraft to make sure they had the necessary protection around their fuel-tank wiring. The airlines have 60 days to complete that work. The agency is also considering inspections for McDonnell-Douglas and Lockheed aircraft. Planes made by Airbus Industrie are not affected because they have a different wiring configuration.

There are 1,088 Boeing 737s in the United States and 2,716 registered worldwide, making it the most common passenger aircraft in use. While the FAA action does not apply to foreign aircraft, most countries follow its lead on safety matters.

anti-semitism

said there are two reasons for this.

"Rather than creating a new office [which would handle complaints of harassment] my job is to support the administration through it's regular offices, and make sure those offices are sensitive to the issues and concerns of Jewish students," Goldbaum said.

Goldbaum said also that the Office has a small staff and had not publicized themselves to a great extent. This has changed since the Office of Jewish Affairs has recently published and distributed a 16 page news letter Shofar, which chronicles the activities of the office.

Goldbaum writes in the newsletter, "the Office of Jewish Affairs is a University administrative office whose primary mission is to provide educational programs for the entire campus (not primarily the Jewish community) in order to improve the climate for all students."

The Office of Jewish Affairs will be an option for the concerned students' complaints on the next survey.

The survey is not in it's final form because the presentation of the data and the wording of the interpretations are still being fine tuned. The final survey should be available in the next few weeks and will be published on the SARIS web page, which is linked to the UMass web page.

Petition filed for arrest of Abul Abbas in Israel

By Laura King
Associated Press

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip — Ask Abul Abbas about the Achille Lauro hijacking, and the answer is a long hard look and a short hard laugh.

"You never forget, all of you, do you?" the 50-year-old former PLO guerrilla chieftain said in an interview yesterday at the flag-draped Gaza City office of the Palestinian faction he heads. Abbas, the mastermind of the infamous 1985 attack on a cruise ship in which an elderly American passenger was shot in his wheelchair and tossed overboard, has said publicly for several years now that the hijacking was a mistake.

However, his presence in Gaza—he is still based in Iraq, but has been spending more time lately in the Palestinian lands—has galvanized calls that he be brought to justice.

Yesterday, a group of Israeli and American activists filed a petition with an Israeli court demanding that he be arrested and tried by Israel.

Over the years, though, Abul Abbas—whose real name is Mohammed Abbas—has proved an exceptionally elusive quarry.

The drama began 13 years ago when the Italian cruise ship Achille Lauro was seized off Port Said, Egypt, by Palestinian terrorists who held the more than 300 passengers hostage.

With the exception of the executed American, Leon Klinghoffer, the passengers were released after a two-day ordeal and the commandos surrendered to Egyptian authorities.

Egypt put Abbas and his men on a flight for Tunisia, where the PLO was headquartered then. But the United States dispatched Navy fighters to force the flight down in Sicily, under Italian jurisdiction.

To the Americans' anger and dismay, however, Italy allowed Abbas to flee to Yugoslavia before a U.S. warrant for piracy and hostage-taking could be served. Abbas disappeared, and international manhunts and a price on his head failed to flush him out.

Along with two other Palestinians, he was convicted in absentia in an Italian court and sentenced to life in prison, but never served any time.

Abbas, a big, burly man with a full fleshy face, says he was not even aboard at the time of the Klinghoffer shooting, and that the guerrillas had only intended to use the cruise to slip two fuel hot commandeer it.

"He describes the operation as one mistake piled on another —but his regrets go only so far.

"It was a struggle between us and our enemy," he said. "Israel gave itself the right to all options, like attacking and raiding and assassinating us. So we used our options, too." Abbas describes himself these days as a firm backer of peace talks with Israel. Not that he thinks they are going anywhere at the moment—it is, he says, a token of his staunch support of Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat.

But Abbas may be positioning himself as a force in his own right in Palestinian politics. That was illustrated when he returned to Gaza last week and got a rousing welcome from 5,000 supporters at an anniversary celebration for the Palestinian Liberation Front, his faction.

Leaders from across the political spectrum delivered laudatory remarks about him, and young supporters listened intently. "If he told us to go back to the resistance now, everyone would support him," said 29-year-old Abdel Shafi, who would only give his last name. "We look up to him."

Abbas said he had no plans to seek any political post, but said he had Arafat's ear, advising him even on sensitive matters. "We speak as brothers," he said.

Partly because of Abbas' popularity, moving against him would pose huge political problems for Arafat. But it's also a hot potato for the government of Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. For one thing, the Israelis would have to explain why they let him back into Gaza in the first place. Although Gaza is Palestinian-run, Israel controls its external borders.

Israel first allowed Abbas back into Gaza in 1996 to vote on a landmark resolution by the Palestinian parliament-in-exile renouncing calls for Israel's destruction. He says this is his fourth visit since then.

The Israeli court petition, brought by a trio of right-wing activists, was clearly seen as a sticky problem. A Justice Ministry spokesman, Moshe Gorali, said it had been passed on to a three-judge panel, something that is done in cases seen as judicially problematic.

Israel suggested that in any event, it is the Americans' responsibility to pursue Abbas.

"I'm frankly surprised that the United States is not demanding his extradition because he killed a U.S. citizen," said David Bar-Illan, a top Netanyahu aide.

Sinn Fein accepts peace accords

By Shawn Pogatchnik
Associated Press

DUBLIN, Ireland — Sinn Fein leader Gerry Adams led his IRA-allied party down the road from revolution to reform yesterday, winning full backing for the Northern Ireland peace accord against the odds of history.

In a fundamental reversal of decades-old policy, 331 out of 350 Sinn Fein activists voted to let their leaders participate in a new compromise administration for Northern Ireland. The verdict followed several hours of public debate at the Royal Dublin Society Hall.

Sinn Fein's warm, if belated, embrace of the accord won't make ratification of the deal any easier in May 22 public referendums. Although Northern Ireland's main Protestant party, the Ulster Unionists, approved it last month, many Protestants will oppose any deal deemed acceptable to Sinn Fein.

Still, the decisive outcome marked a personal triumph for Adams, who since taking charge of Sinn Fein in 1983 has inched the party slowly out of isolation while averting potentially deadly splits in the Sinn Fein-Irish Republican Army movement.

"Today we cleared the way for the future. Tomorrow we start to build the future," Adams told 1,000 cheering delegates.

Adams emphasized that the decision doesn't mean Sinn Fein accepted the right of Northern Ireland to exist, even though he is now free to help govern it.

That key issue has driven the past 30 years of bloodshed— and is spurring dissidents to try to wreck the IRA cease-fire of July 1997.

During the conference, IRA dissidents claimed responsibility for firing two mortar shells at a police barracks in the Northern Ireland border town of Belleek, injuring no one. On Saturday, in their first public statement, they called the truce "over" and accused Adams of taking Sinn Fein down the road of accepting Ireland's partition.

Because of the potential for such splits, Adams had delayed formally accepting the compromise accord reached April 10 with the British and Irish governments and seven other Northern Ireland parties.

British Prime Minister Tony Blair welcomed Sinn Fein's decision. "It means Sinn Fein has signed up to a process in which there is no place whatsoever for violence or the threat of violence," his office said in a statement.

Adams and Martin McGuinness, Sinn Fein's chief negotiator, offered polite applause to about a dozen speakers who bluntly opposed changing Sinn Fein's policy of boycotting government institutions in Northern Ireland, a Protestant-majority state founded in 1920.

"Your beliefs are born in your heart, your strategies in your head. When the two collide, something has to give," said John Murphy, a Sinn Fein activist in his mid-20s from the Irish Republic border town of Monaghan who wanted to reject the agreement. But for most IRA supporters, the head prevailed. Sinn Fein leaders argued that Sinn Fein had to sit on the proposed 108-seat Assembly in Belfast, which would be overseen by a 12-strong Executive from several parties including Sinn Fein.

Cool like that

I am the coolest kid on campus.

No, really, I believe that. I'm in love with my 2.6 GPA, my collection of used clothes, the fact that I masturbate to Victoria's Secret catalogs, and the fact that I like Jewel. I'm in love with my hunk of sh-t truck, my history of low-wage, menial-labor jobs, the three chord original songs I can barely play on my Washburn D-10 guitar, and the fact that I can hardly bench 145 pounds.

Paul Hayes
Class of 1998

It's all the culmination of years of trying to be cool, a goal which I set out to accomplish when I left high school with the class of '93.

By all high school standards, I was not a cool kid at Woburn High School. I wore the Marshalls knock-offs of Bugle Boy and I.O.U. clothes, I only kissed one girl, I did the running man at school dances and I ran track for three seasons. But I saw a chance to change all that in college. I thought, "A change of scenery is all you need, Paul."

So I came to the University of Massachusetts and lived in that bastion of suburban coolness that is Southwest. I was issued my jeans, flannel shirt and hat-with-the-rim-bent-to-a-crease at the door. In two years there I accomplished all two of my goals that, in high school, I thought would bring me instant coolness: getting laid and drinking until I puked.

Well, it left me feeling a little empty and I began to suspect that perhaps I may have aimed my sights a little low. Musically, I had found the cutting edge to be at the decidedly blunt point between Pearl Jam and Nirvana and I found the heights of passion to be drunken sex on the second floor of the Howard Johnson's on Route 9.

"What other cool endeavors could I embark upon?" I thought.

I got pretty good at Street Fighter II my freshman year, but after finding out that there were no groupies in it, I joined a fraternity. But even that wasn't delivering on the coolness, which so many movies like Animal House and Revenge of the Nerds had promised. Somehow getting up at 4 a.m. on a Tuesday to drink sh-tloads of liquor, going to packed houses where only girls got served drinks, and making out with girls when you could barely see straight seemed like a lot more fun in theory.

Add a fraternity house full of broken furniture, rituals that always seemed like boring Halloween parties and the payment of hundreds of dollars in dues that never seemed to go anywhere but into people's pockets, and the result is a less-than-cool situation.

Then one night, when I passed out in the hall on the second floor of Thoreau Residence Hall with a cigarette in one hand and a beer in the other and my nose bleeding, a divine inspiration hit me. "My God!" I thought, "this isn't cool at all. There must be a way things could be cooler." Then a solution hit me.

I was moving to Central.

The funny thing is, I was right. It was a good move. I left the noise and tension of Southwest behind — and entered upon the noise and tension of Baker, where I lived for two years.

My first year there I met the first girl I ever fell in love with, who I thought was about the coolest person I had ever met. She listened to cool music, wore cool clothes, did cool stuff — she was everything the high school kid in me wanted to be. It went great until it went bad, and then things weren't so great anymore. When we broke up, it was about as bad as it could have gotten, until we stopped talking for good, which was worse.

But then things got good for me again, as they inevitably do for everybody, and I realized that maybe everything I had found cool was not necessarily what I found to be cool anymore. I knew the sad, sappy poetry I was writing about my "ex" was very uncool to be sure, so I began to look about for a higher plane of coolness.

Maybe I should become one of those guys who skateboards all over the place. No, I don't have a chain wallet. Maybe I should enter the SGA. No, I'm not clinically insane. Maybe I ought to listen to techno music and go to raves. Hell no, I get nervous when I have too much coffee.

Then I remembered I was an English major, which I had thought would be a cool major. But after about the 20th time I found myself in a classroom surrounded by guys in waist-coats and "refined" accents, I decided that there might be a cooler major. That's when I said to myself "I'm going to be a journalism major, and what's more — I'm going to write for the Collegian!"

Well, that brings me to where I am now, on the verge of graduation, sitting in the Collegian office in the Campus Center basement. Most people seem to think that writing for the Collegian is about as cool as the death of the campus pond's swan, but if you read my words up to this point, that is something I find to be pretty cool.

I suppose that ultimately, even the coolest things in life are disappointing to a high school kid who thought that coolness was nothing more than screwing, beer, and a cigarette. But that kid inevitably grows up.

Now I am rather comfortable with who I am, with what I do, with the uncertainty of my future and the mistakes of my past. I can now sit in on a Friday night and watch crappy FOX television and be content that I think my life is as cool as I ever wanted it to be. My truck is cool, my bike is cool, my friends are cool, my enemies are cool, my strengths are cool, my weaknesses are cool, my opinions are cool, and I am cool. Cooler than anyone I know.

Stomping the in state stigma

Sweat slowly dripped from my forehead and down my back, darkening the white oxford button-down shirt that clung to my body like a straitjacket. A tie hung lifelessly around my neck in the August humidity. As I pushed the shopping cart filled with groceries to the woman's car, all I could think about was getting out of town and going off to college. But something didn't seem right.

"So Chris, you're off to school in the fall, right? Where is it you're going?" she asked as I stuffed the plastic sacks into the trunk of her Mercedes.

"UMass Amherst," I replied, self conscious and preoccupied.

"Really? Hmm, I'm surprised, I thought you were smart."

My first head-on collision with the UMass in-state stigma struck in that steamy suburban parking lot.

With a curt chuckle I went about my day and others like it until I finally arrived on the 11th floor of John Adams, staring out across the Valley wondering what had gone wrong. Four years ago in the Metro-Boston 'burbs it was hammered into my brain that going to UMass was like kissing your sister. If you had good grades, if you were athletic, if you were involved, undoubtedly, you had to go to a private college or university.

In fact, this place was hung over my head like a punishment by teachers and relatives alike for most of my high school career. "You better study or you'll end up at Zoo Mass like everyone else." My senior class sent about 30 students here in the fall of 1994 despite the rampant in-state stigma. Now, I wonder if my private-school-bound peers were as lucky as the 30 of us.

Chris Staam
Class of 1998

In my four years here, my out-of-state peers have marveled at how our school gets panned by Massachusetts media and residents alike. With so many private colleges and universities in New England, it's not hard to see how Your State U has been kept in the shadows — until now. After years of getting pocket change from the legislative purse strings, UMass has changed dramatically.

"With so many private colleges and universities in New England, it's not hard to see how Your State U has been kept in the shadows- until now.

We have a president who travels to state high schools encouraging students to think seriously about UMass (we won't hold the fact that he went to Boston College against him). The bar of admission standards has been raised. New buildings are going up and old ones are slowly being renovated. Most importantly, alumni who left UMass to become CEO's of massive corporations and award-winning athletes and actors are speaking on the school's behalf.

This place is far from perfect, but in all honesty, that's one of the school's strengths. We've all heard the rationalization that after waiting in marathon lines at Whitmore, fighting to get into classes, breathing asbestos, feeling the impact of deferred maintenance and eating dining commons cuisine, we will be better prepared because none of these things are fair. But then again neither is life. As trite, cliched and true as this is, it only scratches the surface. When people in Massachusetts thought about UMass they thought about elevator surfing, drunken keg parties, over- tenured professors and a general Animal House atmosphere.

People are starting to take a closer look. Faculty are earning world-wide recognition for their research. Students are leaving Amherst and making a difference in the world, as they always have, they are just being recognized now.

The University community must continue to use this energy to better itself — nobody will do it for us. We should not sit back when the media (i.e. The Boston Globe) bills us as Hooterville and harps on athletes gone astray and internal political struggles.

UMass has changed drastically in my four years here and I wish it nothing less than success. Ignore the in-state stereotypes and think about how you can change it. Don't simply criticize its lack of tradition, create it yourself. Most of all, take advantage of all UMass has to offer.

In the end, the in state stereotype purveyors will get what they deserve — just think how long your high school classmates that chose private schools will be paying off their student loans. Ah, the price of prestige.

A final word of advice

The best piece of advice I received as a freshman came from a seasoned Collegian reporter, a cynical senior named Henry, who told me on my second visit to the newsroom, "Come into the office a lot, hang out here, even when you don't have a story. Get to know people and get involved."

Looking back four years later, I sometimes wonder whether I should thank the man or curse him. After logging in about 30 hours a week for virtually no pay and zero academic credit, I constantly re-evaluate why I became so involved with the student newspaper. What did it give me in return for the countless sleepless nights, missed classes and gray hairs?

"It's a feeling that comes in fleeting moments,. like walking across this huge campus, that you make a difference among a vast sea of students."

The answer is something completely intangible, something only a student involved in a Registered Student Organization can relate to. It's a feeling that comes in fleeting moments, like while walking across this huge campus, that you make a difference among a vast sea of students.

It sounds like an empty statement by the chancellor in some brochure on why you should come to UMass, but it's really true. They call it "co-curricular experience" — I call it getting involved.

Laura Stock
Class of 1998

There are hundreds of groups on campus to get involved with, and each plays a role in the University community. On a campus of 25,000, it's pretty difficult to distinguish yourself from the masses. Academically, there will always be someone who can get comparable grades. Running, or even being part of an RSO, can make you feel like you gave something to UMass, instead of just taking from it.

Granted, a lot of these positions are behind the scenes. There's not too much glory in getting up at 5 a.m. to make sure the bagels are delivered to People's Market, but the hundreds of students who patronize the student-run business every day certainly do care.

Being part of a high-profile organization, such as the Student Government Association, can have its pitfalls as well. SGA has the prestige and power of controlling student fees and allocating monies to other student organizations. With that, however, comes accountability to the student body and often times, public scrutiny.

Which brings me back to the Collegian — the only RSO I can speak about with full knowledge. Spending night after night in a basement with no windows, writing and editing stories, only to wake up the next morning and have your professor point out typos on the front page is heartbreaking. But working at a student-run organization is a learning experience, and we all make mistakes.

Don't pity a student who contributes to a, RSO, though. It may seem like being part of a student-run organization is a draining, thankless job — but there are benefits to be reaped.

I thank the Collegian for many things. I came in a shy freshman, writing 300-word film reviews. A semester later, I was film editor, and started to sense the public recognized me — though most of the response came in prank-call form for panning a Jim Carrey movie.

By junior year, I made the leap to news reporting, covering crime on campus like assaults and rapes — inspiring me to go to law school following graduation. Being news editor during privatization protests and the Goodell Takeover was thrilling, even though most of my work was done behind the scenes.

My current, and soon to be ending position of managing editor has been taxing, but worthwhile. My parents, friends and professors all think I am crazy to devote so much time to one organization which seemingly offers little in return. But being a part of this RSO was more than just a line on the resume for me — it gave me confidence and skills that I will use long after my time here at UMass is up.

After writing and editing at the Collegian for four years, I have received some recognition, the most significant of which came last November in a postcard from Costa Rica. After reading the paper on the Internet, Henry noticed my current editorial position, and dropped me a line to say he was proud his advice to a fledgling film critic brought me such success.

So, in my final piece for the paper and the community that has given so much to me, I chose to pass on Henry's advice. Get involved. You will be rewarded.

Giants show off new tricks

By Kevin Monahan
Collegian Staff

THEY MIGHT BE GIANTS
Pearl St.
May 8

Playing at Pearl Street has become routine for They Might Be Giants. While at times they seemed to be going through the motions, John Linnell, John Flansburgh and company unleashed an interesting bag of tricks on the audience Friday night at the recently re-opened venue proving that no matter how methodical their shows may get, there will still be plenty of fun and a few surprises.

The first unexpected event of the evening was Flansburgh taking the stage to announce that scheduled openers Lincoln were not playing and to introduce their replacement Double Dog. They Might Be Giants needed a band stranger than they already are to open for them. If you've always wanted to know what psychedelic a cappella hip-hop sounded like, you were in for a real treat. Double Dog consisted of one human drum machine, one male vocalist, and one female vocalist producing all the joys of an obscene phone call. While most of Double Dog's songs sounded like a badly faked orgasm, their set was interesting and their style original.

They Might Be Giants took stage through a blinding flash of cheesy disco lights and a grandiose (pre-recorded) orchestral accompaniment. Linnell strapped on his accordion and launched right into "Particle Man." They plugged their upcoming live album—Severe Tire Damage, and provided some witty banter with the audience. "New York City" from their most recent studio album—Factory Showroom and "She's Actual Size," featuring a solo from drummer Dan Hickey were early highlights.

A few of the high points include severed puppet heads, with which Linnell and Flansburgh played ventriloquists during "Exquisite Dead Guy," and a confetti cannon which shot a technicolor shower on the crowd during "James K. Polk." As if new props were not enough, Flansburgh found it necessary to introduce new instruments, specifically a microphone attached to a stick. Other surprises include "Sapphire Bullets of Pure Love" which they stopped playing circa 1988.

After playing the hit "Ana Ng," Hickey and bassist Hal Cragin got a chance to showcase their talents during "Battle for the Planet of the Apes" which required a fair amount of audience participation. TMBG finished up their set with their hit songs "Birdhouse In Your Soul" and "The Guitar" (complete with conga lines) before playing two encores, which included "Istanbul (Not Constantinople)" and "They Might Be Giants."

One never ends a They Might Be Giants show where they started emotionally, mentally or physically. Now matter how systematic Friday night's show may have been, They Might Be Giants can be counted to tantalize the audience. It is the kind of bouncy delight that's guaranteed to put you in a good mood.

Strong acting lifts Guild's Angels

By Emily Trask
Collegian Staff

In the staging of Angels in America: The Millenium Approaches, over the weekend, the UMass Theater Guild dealt with some difficult subjects. The issues in this play are pertinent to the times in which we are living, namely coming to terms with the devastating effects of AIDS.

As the lights went down, the Student Union Ballroom was transformed into an abyss of darkness with only a few spot lights focused on the six dancers. Donned in black, with painted faces, their movements were sweeping, graceful, and almost demonic, hinting at what was yet to come. Although often provocative and sexy, the opening was a bit lengthy, and it might have been more effective had it been shorter. But overall, this introductory dance piece captured the essence of the entire show.

The play was divided into three seemingly unrelated narratives portraying the lives' of a homosexual male couple, a young heterosexual couple, and a rather promincuous single male in the middle of his life.

The first thread of the play began with a comedic and touching eulogy and account of the Jewish immigrant's struggle in the United States by Rabbi Isidor Chemelwitz played by Susan Boyle. The point of this monologue was to explicate the loss of this ancient heritage with each passing generation, which (later in scene four) led to the introduction of two of the main characters Louis Ironson (Chris Budz) and Prior Walter (Russell Rakouskas).

In scene two, we were introduced Roy M. Cohn (Humphrey brown III) and Joseph Porter Pitt (David Manning Flanley). The scene which was marked by acute tension, indicated that there was something, especially about Joe, that wasn't being said.

Presented with a promotion in Washington D.C., Joseph who says that "he wants to go were something good happens" is reluctant to take the opportunity because of his wife. In scene three, his wife Harper (Amtiy Dunn) is revealed to us. Hearing and seeing things that are not there, refusing to leave her apartment, and constantly popping valium are what constituted this woman's existence. Dunn's portrayal of Harper was truly impressive. But the audience is left to wonder whether it was her unhappy childhood or her husband that has left her so delusional.

The same day, outside of the funeral home Prior informs, his lover, Louis that he has "the wine dark kiss of the Angel of Death." In other words, he has lesions on his body, an indication of the presence of the AIDS virus.

Bellamy and Winslow hit the FAC; sound problems don't stop the laughs

COURTESY DAVID NATKINS

Voice artist extraordinaire Michael Winslow teamed up with comic Bill Bellamy Friday night at the Fine Arts center.

By Laura Jakutowicz
Collegian Staff

Something Every Friday and University Productions and Concerts presented comedians Bill Bellamy and Michael Winslow at the Fine Arts Center last Friday.

Winslow kicked off the show with a rousing Jimi Hendrix impersonation. Complete with retro-garb, it was soon apparent that those characteristic Hendrix guitar licks beaming off the stage were not being made by an off-stage sound effects machine, but from Winslow himself.

The Hendrix garb was soon discarded after he performed the classic Hendrix 'Star Spangled Banner,' and the Michael Winslow of Police Academy fame took to the stage. After a quick self-introduction, he warmed up to a FAC crowd which received him like a rock star.

After warming up the crowd, Bellamy took the stage at the UMass show just one stop of a national college tour.

He went on to joke about everything from car jacking to the television show "When Animals Attack."

F. Travel/Routes to Campus

PLEASE ALERT YOUR PARENTS AND OTHER GUESTS TO THE FOLLOWING IMPORTANT INFORMATION TO ENSURE TIMELY ARRIVAL:

Traffic into the greater Amherst area may be heavy as early as 9:00 am on the morning of Undergraduate Commencement. (Amherst College's Commencement is at 10:00 a.m.) Without careful planning, delays may be encountered!

The major points of congestion are usually at the intersection of exit 19 of I-91 and Route 9 in Northampton; Route 9 immediately after crossing the Coolidge Bridge into Hadley; and routes off Massachusetts Turnpike exit 8 (Palmer).

Local police will be directing traffic at some of these points and others en route to campus.

We have arranged for radio traffic advisories to be broadcast. Tune to Amherst radio station WTTT (1430 AM) within approximately 25 miles of Amherst, or WRNX (100.9 FM), within 50 miles.

On arrival, University Police and security officers will direct drivers to designated parking lots from which free shuttle buses, with frequent departures, will take guests to and from the Stadium. For services for mobility impaired guests, please call 545-0892.

If using the Massachusetts Turnpike from the east, one of the following routes other than exit 8 (Palmer) is suggested:

Exit 7 (Ludlow):	Route 21 north to US 202 north to 9 west
Exit 5 (Chicopee):	Route 33 north to 116 north
Exit 4 (W. Springfield):	I-91 north to exit 19 to 9 east.

If traveling north via I-91, and exit 19 (Route 9 east, Northampton) is in gridlock, you may chose to continue north to exit 24, to Routes 5 and 10 north, and then immediately right to 116 south.

For other Commencement-related information please call the Visitors Center at 545-0306.

Congratulations from the Entire University community!

1998 UNDERGRADUATE COMMENCEMENT FINAL INFORMATION AND INSTRUCTIONS

The following general information and instructions will help you prepare for the Commencement ceremony. Since there is no pre-Commencement rehearsal, it is VERY important that you take the time to review it. Although admittedly lengthy, experience indicates that your attention to the necessary details will help to ensure that the ceremony will begin and end on time and with a minimum of confusion. It supplements the information brochure which was mailed to seniors of record as of February 13, 1998. I hope you will find the information and instructions to be helpful. Please especially note paragraph F concerning traffic and routes to campus!

On arrival at the Stadium, staff and faculty marshals and other volunteers will assist you and answer any questions you may have. They will also prepare you for the Student Processional and escort you onto the field and to your designated seats. Please cooperate with them throughout the ceremony.

The Student Processional begins at approximately 10:10 a.m. The ceremony begins at 10:30 a.m. and will conclude at approximately noon. In the case of heavy rain, it will still be held outside at the Stadium, but it will shortened so as to conclude in less than one hour.

While the Commencement ceremony is, in part, a celebration, it is also a formal event. There are several significant ways in which you can contribute to its success. Perhaps most important is to observe regulations concerning alcohol. Abuses in the past unfortunately spoiled the day for many, subjecting the graduates and the University to public criticism.

Further, to preserve the tradition and the dignity of this event, please be respectful to the speakers and honorary degree recipients. Several are UMass graduates and all of them are distinguished individuals, here at our invitation, and deserving of your attentiveness.

The Commencement Planning Committee, several hundred other employees, and many unpaid volunteers, have devoted considerable time and effort, some for more than a year, to ensuring the success of this important day. We are committed to doing all that we can do to make it as memorable, enjoyable, and meaningful as possible for you as well as for your guests. We ask for your cooperation in making it a day in which we can all take pride.

Thank you, and congratulations on behalf of the Planning Committee as well as the entire University community.

UNIVERSITY OF MASSACHUSETTS AMHERST — Office of the Chancellor

May 1, 1998

To the Class of 1998,

Within a few weeks, the completion of your undergraduate years will officially be recognized as the University celebrates - with you- its one hundred and twenty-eighth commencement.

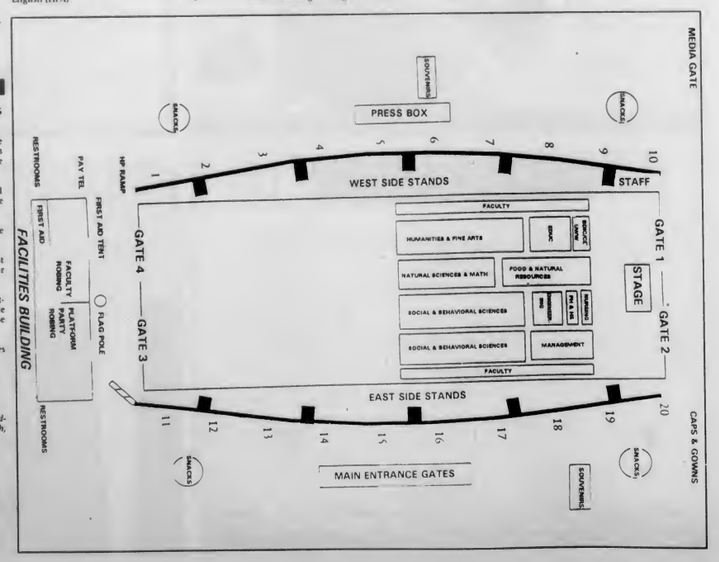
In 1871, the first class of the then Massachusetts Agricultural College graduated 27 individuals, all with Bachelor of Science degrees In a very limited number of majors. Many went on to distinguished careers in the Commonwealth. Their record of distinctive accomplishments helped to establish the notable reputation of what became, in 1947, the University of Massachusetts.

And now, in 1998, more than 4,000 of you, In nearly 100 different majors, will be graduating and making your marks not only in the Commonwealth but also throughout the United States and indeed, around the world.

On behalf of the faculty and staff, I congratulate you for having successfully fulfilled the demanding course of study leading to your degree. I know it is the result of considerable hard work, and you have every right to be as proud of your achievement as we are of you.

I look forward to joining with you, your families and friends on May 24 to commemorate and applaud your academic accomplishments.

Best wishes to you and the best of luck in the future. And don't forget to come back to visit, for you are always welcome here.



Sincerely,

David K. Scott
Chancellor

The show was a huge success overall with the audience rolling in the aisles from Winslow and Bill Bellamy's crazy antics. As host of "MTV's Most Wanted Jams" Bellamy used his interaction with numerous stars as part of his comedic monologue.

Winslow is best known for his character Officer Larvelle Jones from the Police Academy film series. Winslow can imitate over 10,000 sound effects using his voice alone. Winslow has made a presence on the screen acting in such films as Cheech and Chong's Next Movie, Cheech and Chong's Nice Dreams, and Spaceballs. In addition, he provided the voice for Stripe in the movie Gremlins.

Acoustical problems in the beginning of the show hardly left its mark on the performance. A faulty microphone prompted Bellamy to quip, "Where did you get this microphone, Radio Shack?"

The audience seemed to thoroughly enjoy the show despite the sound problems, with everyone laughing throughout the performance.

Next on the series will be tonight's performance of comedienne Melanie Comarcho at Bowker Auditorium at 8 p.m. with the movie "Good Will Hunting" following for free.

Tuesday, May 12 will feature comedian Wayne David Smith at Bowker Auditorium at 8 p.m. with "Good Will Hunting" following for free.

Wednesday, May 13, be sure to look out for the improv group Comedy Sportz at Bowker Auditorium at 8 p.m. with another showing of "Good Will Hunting".

Raffles will take place at each of the next four events. For more information on any of these shows contact University Productions and Concerts (UPC) at 545-2892, or Something Every Friday at 545-3600.

Summer arrives with a mild Impact

By Bryan McAllister
Collegian Staff

DEEP IMPACT
Directed by Mimi Leder
with Robert Duvall, Tea Leoni and Morgan Freeman
Playing at Hampshire Mall Theaters

Comets, meteors, asteroids and any other flying objects of mass destruction have always fascinated us. This summer we get a couple of them, and to kick it off there is Deep Impact, which amounts to little more than a softball. If we're measuring by Taco Bell sauces — and why not — Deep Impact is comfortably mild.

In a promising prelude, the film begins with a young boy (Elijah Wood) accidently discovering a comet heading toward Earth through his telescope. It's a little hard to believe no one else in the world would notice, but nevertheless the comet produces an alarming apocalyptic threat.

A year later, the now top-secret news is being tracked by MSNBC news reporter Jenny Lerner (Tea Leoni). Later, everyone one in America will watch her host the end of the world updates, and perhaps it's the film's greatest implausibility (and there are many) that when life comes to an end, everyone will be watching MSNBC.

Deep Impact, inherently, has a problem. It's a big disaster movie, but the impressive special effects can only arrive at the very end. There's a lot of time to fill. The film is at times respectable but never overly exciting; at others compelling but overly ridiculous.

Morgan Freeman plays the president, and like in Amistad, his primary role is to look solemn and never smile. After he announces the impending doom, we get a whole bunch of scenes where the main characters don't seem to care. Robert Duvall, leading a group of astronauts to save Earth, sums it up best: "They're not scared of dying. They're just scared of looking bad on TV." Nice line, but it's never elaborated on.

The potential here is as vast as the comet's impact. However, we only get three stories — Duvall's team in space, Leoni and her boring parents (including a wasted Vanessa Redgrave), and in the film's most shameless plot, a puppy-dog courtship between blue-eyed Wood and a young girl that makes Leo and Kate's Titanic affair look like Shakespeare.

Because the focus is on these three characters, we never see any other people. The tension, the doom, the fear is never really seen. Director Mimi Leder (The Peacemaker) excels at moving crowds, though, and we finally witness this in the film's rip-roaring, tidal waving but all too short finale.

COURTESY BOB GREENE

Some of Deep Impact, though, manages to be pretty moving, particularly final scenes with the crew of Duvall's ship and their families. There is talent, after all, behind Industrial Light and Magic's show — screenwriters Michael Tolkin (The Player) and Bruce Joel Rubin (Ghost). Their script is devoid of fun and humor but full of emotion, sacrifice and prayers to God.

When will the real fireworks be delivered? The next pitch is July fourth weekend when Armageddon invades theaters. Oh boy. One can imagine the Jerry Bruckheimer production taking itself less seriously, which means we will, too. When you're talking about the end of the world, it's hard to make everyone happy.

After being introduced to all of the key players, slowly their narratives become clearly intertwined. Roy discovers that he also has AIDS, Joe begins to question his sexuality, Harper contemplates leaving Joe. Prior's health steadily declines, which seemed to directly correlate to his relationship with Louis, who is unable to deal with the horrifying brutality of Prior's sickness.

The most heart wrenching scenes occurred at the end of the play, as Prior lay alone in his bedroom on the edge of death, he imagined that Louis came back to him. They embraced and danced passionately while the chilling melody of U2's With or Without You played in the background. Rakouskas's performance was exquisite; he perfectly captured Prior's anguish and heartache.

In light of this unmerciful virus, throughout the play, the characters as well as the audience were forced into a deep philosophical probing of the self and an attempt to discover truth in this world filled with deception.

While the overall performance was captivating, there were a few minor drawbacks of the show. The set up of the ballroom made it difficult for the audience members in the last row to enjoy the performance. Also, while it was effective in weaving the narratives together, the movement and noise of the sets was somewhat distracting.

In any case, the entire cast and crew of Angels should be applauded for such a valiant undertaking and for pulling it off fairly successfully. All of the roles were cast perfectly, and each performer captured the heart of their role.

UMass women's lacrosse falls to No. 1 Nittany Lions

Webb finds a way to get Nittany Lions close win

By Jamie Jee
Collegian Staff

When coaches say there's no time to lose — they mean it.

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team found that out the hard way Saturday, when they were defeated by No. 1 seed Pennsylvania State University (9–8) in the ECAC Tournament, 14–13.

JORMA KANJANEN / COLLEGIAN

Junior attack Laura Korutz scored four goals in the ECAC Tournament for UMass during Saturday's loss to Pennsylvania State University.

UMass (9–6) was stunned in the closing seconds of the game as Nittany Lion Jen Webb strode through the Minutewomen defense and managed to get a shot away with one second left. The ball then sailed past freshman goalie Jen Nardi to complete Penn State's comeback after being down two goals with a little over three minutes left to play.

"It was tough because we had worked on similar game situations in the week of practice before the game," Massachusetts coach Francesca McClellan said. "It was just too bad that we couldn't get it to work."

Initially, nothing seemed to be working for UMass as the team fell behind early and quickly had to fight their way back from a three goal deficit.

They managed to do just that and after swapping a pair of goals, the Minutewomen surged ahead on a four goal run led by sophomore midfielder Stephanie Pavlick and followed up by senior midfielder Jennifer Herker. Pavlick reduced the Nittany Lion lead to one and Herker scored the back end goals of the rally to give UMass a 6–5 lead. Both teams then tacked on a goal each before halftime and the Minutewomen were beginning to realize that they could play with the home team.

"This was the best game of the season for us," McClellan said. "We controlled the ball for most of the game. We did a good job at setting things up. I think we just beat ourselves in the end."

Unfortunately for UMass, their stellar performance came against one of the tougher teams in the East and time was not on their side.

"It was a very even game," McClellan said. "They have been in tournament games before and in crunch time, it may have given them the edge."

If so, it was one you might have to break out the science kit to look at. Use the microscope.

Penn State repeatedly tried to expand that edge, but the Minutewomen appeared undaunted as they refused to give in. Starting off the second half, the Lions fired off three scoring strikes to put them back on top, but UMass countered with its own three-goal scoring barrage when sophomore midfielder Colleen Wales made herself heard with the opening counter. Freshman attack Fay Naber then evened it up at 9–9 and at the 9:23 mark, took the lead as Laura Korutz tallied her third score of the game.

Webb would not be outdone, however, as she came back to even the score. Jen Johnson also chimed in and the Minutewomen saw their lead vanish again.

As time ticked away, UMass needed to put together another spurt and they did. Korutz netted her fourth, and the following 1–2 sophomore midfielder punch of Pavlick and Rebecca Minaker knocked Penn State back down by two goals. What they didn't count on though, was the Lions getting back up.

"It was an exceptional game," McClellan said. "We did have some trouble taking care of the ball, but the kids knew that."

Penn continued the theme of three goal strings to finish the game. Emily Mechem, who had been a thorn in the Minutewomen's side all day, started the run with her fourth of the day, set up by a deft assist from Julie Tice who collected five in the game. Johnson, who also scored four goals, then tied the game up and the stage was set for Webb's heroics.

Well, almost.

That was because the Lions seemed to benefit from a questionable call on Korutz, who had stripped a Penn player of the ball and was charging up field to at least force the match into overtime. It was not to be as the official called her out of bounds and gave the Lions the ball at 30 yard line.

"We got a taste of it," McClellan said. "The players got a taste of it. The coaches got a taste of it. We're really ready. We're only going to be stronger [next year]."

Duke edges Tarheels, Cav's romp Hobart

By Chris Sheridan
Associated Press

AMHERST — Seventh-seeded Duke beat North Carolina 16-14 and sixth-seeded Virginia beat Hobart 16-10 in the first round of the NCAA Lacrosse Championships on Saturday at Massachusetts' Garber Field.

Duke, which had beaten 12th-seeded North Carolina 13-9 during the regular season, broke a 1-1 tie with four unanswered goals in the first period.

The Blue Devils (11-3) advanced to the quarterfinals and a meeting with second-seeded Princeton, which received a first-round bye. The game will be played at Hofstra University in Hempstead, N.Y., on May 16.

Duke led 9-4 at halftime, and Carolina staged a mini-comeback by scoring the game's final four goals, three in the last minute. Nick Hartolfilis led Duke with four goals, followed by John Fay, Jared Frood and T.J. Durnan with three apiece.

Chase Martin tallied four times and Brett Kohart three times for North Carolina, which finished with a 7-8 record.

In the day's second game, Virginia, trailing by two goals twice early in the second half, gathered momentum in the third period to defeat unseeded Hobart.

Virginia (8-4) trailed 1-0 after one period but showed a 37-13 advantage in shots despite a narrow 3-2 lead at halftime. After falling behind 7-5 in the third period, Virginia erupted for five straight goals, including three in a row by Jamie Leachman, to take the lead for good.

The Cavaliers advanced to the quarterfinals and a game against third-seeded Syracuse on May 16 at Hofstra.

UM water polo sets records at nationals

The Massachusetts women's water polo team competed in the National Championships this past weekend, finishing eighth out of twelve teams. The finish is the highest in school history.

UMass (30–6) opened up its tournament play against No. 10 seed Michigan, edging the Wolverines, 6–5. The Minutewomen came out shooting with two quick goals in the first period, but at the end of regulation the score was tied, 4–4.

In sudden death double overtime it was sophomore Marci Hupp who came through for UMass when she scored to give the Minutewomen the victory after junior goalie Peggy Nieves had held Michigan scoreless for over nine minutes.

The Minutewomen then advanced to the next round and were faced with the task of playing a strong Stanford squad, ranked second in the nation.

Junior Andrea Vazquez and sophomore Katie Grogan had one goal a piece, but the Cardinal eventually prevailed defeating UMass by the score of 10-2 and sending them to a matchup with No. 6 USC.

The Minutewomen had difficulty finding the back of the net against Trojan goalie Bernice Orwig, who made 14 saves and preserved the 5-0 lead USC had established at by the half. The Trojans went on to win 8–4.

UMass finished against No. 5 San Diego State and started off the scoring with a goal by Hupp. The Aztecs came back with four goals in the final period, however, and defeated the Minutewomen, 8–3.

With the win over Michigan, UMass set the school record for most wins in a season.

Miller makes more N.Y. memories in comeback

By Chris Sheridan
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Call this one "Reggie Miller Kills The Knicks, Chapter III," with huge costarring roles for Rik Smits and Mark Jackson.

Miller tormented New York one more time yesterday, making a game-tying 3-pointer with 5.1 seconds left in regulation and a finishing coach 3-pointer with 1:28 left in overtime as the Indiana Pacers took a 3-1 second-round series lead over the Knicks with a 118-107 victory.

It was the latest episode of Miller saving his best for Madison Square Garden, the place where he had two of his greatest career playoff moments in 1994 (25 points in the fourth quarter) and 1995 (8 points in the final 8.9 seconds).

This time, he had some help.

Smits scored 14 of his 23 points in the fourth quarter, almost single-handedly bringing the Pacers back from a late eight-point deficit, and Jackson scored five straight points in overtime as Indiana quickly took control.

Miller finished the job with 1:28 left by making a 3-pointer from the same spot as his earlier one, shooting a stare at Spike Lee after the ball swished through.

He finished with 38 points, one short of his career playoff-high set against New York in 1994. Jackson added 16 points and 15 assists. Chris Mullin scored 18 and the Pacers shot 10-for-23 from 3-point range.

The series resumes Wednesday night in Indianapolis, with Game 6 back in New York on Friday night, if necessary.

"It will be a dogfight Wednesday," Miller said. "There's no guarantee that it's over."

Allan Houston and John Starks led a balanced attack for New York with 19 points apiece, but Houston scored only one point in the second half and missed the final shot of regulation after the Knicks were left stunned by Miller's 3-pointer.

Larry Johnson added 18 points, Patrick Ewing had 17 and Charlie Ward 13.

The Knicks seemed to be in control as they led 100-93 with 3:47 left, but they would miss their next five shots - two of which were blocked by Game 2 hero Antonio Davis.

Davis sank two free throws to make it 100-99 with 58.4 seconds left, then blocked Johnson's shot the next time down. Starks made two free throws with 19.3 seconds left, giving Indiana one more chance to tie.

After Smits missed a 5-footer, the rebound was batted out to the 3-point line and Jackson swung it to Miller, who made the 3-pointer with 5.1 seconds left.

"I was really surprised I was so open," Miller said. "Those are the scariest shots to take."

Houston attempted a runner from the lane just before the final buzzer, but he went off the wrong foot, his shot was short and the game went to overtime.

Jackson made quick work of the Knicks from there, making a 3-pointer and a driving layup in the first 85 seconds.

New York then missed three straight shots and committed three turnovers, and Miller ended all doubt by making his final 3-pointer for a 112-102 lead with 1:28 left.

Chris Childs scored seven straight points for New York early in the fourth, and a 3-pointer by Ward with seven minutes left gave the Knicks a 91-87 lead.

After the teams traded baskets, Childs threw an alley-oop pass to Ewing that he was barely able to reach. But rather than try to score off the pass, Ewing simply redirected it to Johnson for a layup that made it 97-89 with 4:55 left.

That, however, would be the Knicks' final field goal until 1:23 remained in overtime.

Notes: Mullin, who led the NBA in free throw shooting at 94 percent, missed two of four attempts. Dale Davis, who went 2-for-10 from the line in Game 2, and Antonio Davis, who went 1-for-4, combined to shoot 2-for-4 at the line Sunday. ... Derrick McKey (strained quadriceps) did not play for Indiana. ... The Knicks had won their five previous home playoff games with Ewing in the lineup.

NCAA sets new regs., trying to stop weight loss by dehydration

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

Priscilla M. Clarkson, a University of Massachusetts Amherst exercise science professor, has expressed her support for new National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) college wrestling regulations prohibiting wrestlers from using dangerous methods of severe dehydration in order to lose weight.

The severity and consequences of the issue were brought forth after dehydration led to the deaths of three athletes last fall.

The practice was undertaken to help athletes lose weight so they could qualify to compete in a lower weight category than previously allowed by current NCAA rules. In effect, this act would provide wrestlers with a competitive advantage over their slightly "underweight" opponents.

"The object is to get your weight as low as you can," Clarkson said in a press release. "Dehydration is quite dangerous, and in some cases, wrestlers were carried to the weigh-in because they were so weakened."

In April, Clarkson and other members of the NCAA Committee on Competitive Standards and Medical Aspects of Sports met in Kansas City, Mo. with the NCAA Wrestling Rules Committee.

The two bodies recommended a series of changes that would reduce the use of laxatives and emetics, food and fluid consumption restrictions, self-induced vomiting, and the use of hot rooms and saunas for all wrestlers during the season.

In addition, each athlete's minimum weight will be established at the beginning of each season, and the athletes will be monitored to make sure they don't lose more than 1.5 percent of body weight per week over eight weeks.

Weigh-ins will now be held one hour before meets, not 24 hours prior to the event. Also, wrestling coaches must now be certified in cardiopulmonary resuscitation (CPR) and first aid.

"The changes will be evaluated during the next year and further research will be done on how changes in weight and body composition affect performance during competition," Clark said.

Top Indian surgeons harvesting kidneys

NEW DELHI, India (AP) — After luring dozens of poor Indians with promises of cash or jobs, three leading Indian transplant surgeons robbed them of their kidneys and sold the organs to rich clients, authorities said yesterday.

The doctors allegedly paid agents to cruise shantytowns for potential patients in a racket that involved several Indian states. Police arrested the three surgeons, the owner of the prestigious Noida Medicare Center and six others, said Manoj Singh, the senior official in Gautam Budh Nagar, an industrial district next to New Delhi.

The arrests Sunday came after Shaukat Ali, a mechanic, filed a complaint that he had been robbed of a kidney after being taken to the center — one of the few in the country that performs kidney transplants — for a medical examination.

Hospital solicitors had promised him a lucrative job in Singapore and told him the examination was necessary to get a visa, Ali said.

Rise in number of police officers killed

WASHINGTON (AP) — During 1997, 64 law enforcement officers were murdered in the line of duty nationwide, up from 56 the previous year, the FBI said yesterday.

The bureau said its preliminary figures show that firearms remain the most frequently used weapon. Handguns were used in 43 of the murders, rifles in 12, shotguns in six. Two officers were stabbed and one was killed by a blow from an assailant's fists or feet.

At the time, 27 of the officers were wearing body armor. Three were killed with their own weapons.

The South accounted for 31 of the murders; the West for 15; the Midwest, 11; and the Northeast, seven.

Seventeen were killed during arrests: six while attempting to prevent robberies or catch robbery suspects, five serving arrest warrants, five trying to catch burglary suspects and one investigating a drug-related incident.

Fourteen officers were murdered while answering disturbance calls, 12 in ambushes, nine investigating suspicious people or events, seven enforcing traffic laws, and four handling prisoners.

India conducts 3 tests; says it's nuclear capable

By Ashok Sharma
Associated Press

NEW DELHI, India — India set off three underground nuclear blasts yesterday and announced it was capable of making nuclear weapons, enraging its neighbor and rival, Pakistan, and defying a worldwide campaign to contain the spread of nuclear arms.

The 1-month-old government led by the Hindu nationalist Bharatiya Janata Party surprised allies and enemies alike with the nation's first nuclear tests in 24 years.

Prime Minister Atal Bihari Vajpayee, fighting a reputation of being too weak to control his fractious coalition partners, summoned reporters to his home to reveal that India had conducted three underground nuclear tests in the desert 330 miles southwest of New Delhi.

No radiation was released into the atmosphere, he insisted, adding that scientists tested a fission device, a low-yield device and a thermonuclear device. He refused to answer questions. Pakistan, also believed to have nuclear capability, immediately pledged to make its defenses "impregnable against any Indian threat, be it nuclear or conventional."

"The responsibility for dealing a death blow to the global efforts at nuclear nonproliferation rests squarely with India," Pakistani Foreign Minister Gauhar Ayub told lawmakers in the Pakistani capital of Islamabad.

The United States expressed its disappointment but did not say if it would ban aid or impose sanctions to keep sophisticated technology out of India.

"This runs counter to the effort the international community is making to promulgate a comprehensive ban on such testing," Clinton spokesman Mike McCurry said in Washington.

Nonetheless, Indian officials were clearly in a celebratory mood, handing out sweets to reporters at a news conference. "We have taken economic repercussions into account. We will not face any problems," said Brajesh Mishra, an aide to the prime minister. "These tests have established that India has a proven capability for a weaponized nuclear program."

"I hope the U.S. would understand that the tests were meant for the security of the people of India," he added.

Agent admits he protected 2 mob informants

By Erica Noonan
Associated Press

BOSTON — The retired FBI agent walked to the witness stand, still looking the part of a G-man. Gray suit. Nondescript tie. Silver hair. Eyes straight ahead.

Then came the questions that made him squirm a bit; questions about a past he really didn't care to talk about.

Had he, John Morris, former chief of the FBI's Boston organized crime unit, exchanged Christmas gifts of books and liquor with mobsters James J. "Whitey" Bulger and Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi?

Yes, answered Morris.

Had he, John Morris, taken upwards of $6,000 from Bulger — one of Boston's most notorious tough guys — including $1,000 to bring his girlfriend to a 1982 Drug Enforcement Agency conference in Georgia?

Yes, Morris admitted, he had.

Had Morris and other agents shielded Bulger and Flemmi from prosecution for 20 years because they were the most prized secret FBI informants in New England history?

Yes, Morris told the judge.

The agent testified for hours, then days, bearing witness to the fact that the FBI in Boston had protected some gangsters and sacrificed less powerful thugs in the pursuit of inside information.

While scores of other mobsters went to jail over the years, Bulger and Flemmi emerged from FBI stings unscathed. And Morris said he was taking cases of French Bordeaux and envelopes stuffed with cash from Bulger and Flemmi.

Republicans' images suffering

Survey says republicans seen as defenders of tobacco industry

By David Espo
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Despite efforts to remake their image, Republicans are seen by the public as more interested in shielding the tobacco industry than in protecting young people from smoking, according to a poll taken for the GOP. It also found the opposite is true for Democrats.

At the same time, the survey suggested that Republicans can scuttle the comprehensive tobacco bill pending in the Senate in favor of a less-sweeping measure without additional loss of public support.

The conclusions were contained in a nationwide survey completed within the last two weeks for the Republican National Committee and shared with lawmakers in recent days.

"Republicans — but not Democrats — have a perception problem as defenders of the tobacco industry," reads the document circulated by RNC Chairman Jim Nicholson.

While Democrats were also viewed as defenders of the industry in a survey last fall, they "have flipped their imagery" in the intervening months, it adds.

The findings come at a critical time in the debate over tobacco, and with Republicans still searching for an election-year strategy. The Senate is expected to begin work next week on tobacco-related legislation, possibly on a bill crafted by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz). It would increase the price of cigarettes by $1.10 a pack, require the industry to pay $516 billion over 25 years, increase the authority of the Food and Drug Administration to regulate nicotine products and extend limited liability to the industry from future lawsuits.

While Majority Leader Trent Lott of Mississippi is expected to bring the issue to the floor next week, an aide said during the day he hasn't yet decided whether McCain's bill or an alternative will be the one advanced for debate.

In the House, Speaker Newt Gingrich has attacked McCain's bill as a "big government" response, and says he favors an alternative more directly targeted to cutting down on teen smoking and linked to provisions designed to curtail drug use.

At the same time, advocates of McCain's measure and the tobacco industry are waging dueling advertising campaigns in a bid to mold public opinion.

The industry maintains that McCain's measure is an enormous tax increase in disguise that would create a black market for cigarettes. A report issued over the weekend by a GOP leadership group in the Senate charged McCain with understating the actual cost of his bill by tens of billions of dollars.

The counter-campaign by public interest health groups says that cigarette-makers are counting on lawmakers to bail them out this year.

The RNC survey, only a small portion of which was devoted to tobacco, was taken jointly by Tarrance & Associates, Public Opinion Strategies and Voter Consumer Research. None of the three polling firms would comment on the survey, nor did the RNC.

Beginning with Gingrich, Republicans have labored for months to distance themselves from the tobacco industry, which has contributed generously to GOP campaigns over the years. In the House, for example, Virginia Rep. Tom Bliley, chairman of the Commerce Committee, has generated headlines for subpoenaing industry documents.

In the Senate, GOP Whip Don Nickles of Oklahoma and others have spoken out against giving legal immunity to the industry as part of any legislation.

Still, the survey summary indicated that Republicans have made only modest inroads in the perception that they are defenders of the tobacco industry.

Last October, "We were seen as more industry-sensitive by a margin of 52-24. Now that margin is a little better, 48-28," said the summary. "However, the Democrats have flipped their imagery. Then they were 44-32 more industry-sensitive. Now that margin is 47-29 the other way, more youth-sensitive."

When it comes to legislation, though, the summary says Republicans who back a comprehensive bill are no worse off than those who back a more limited approach when confronted with Democratic attacks that they are too cozy with the industry. "Overall, relative to the Democratic attack... a 'skinny' approach actually does marginally better than the more comprehensive approach," it says.

Reno looking into seventh Clinton official for fraud

By Michael J. Sniffen
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Attorney General Janet Reno requested an independent counsel to investigate whether Labor Secretary Alexis Herman engaged in influence peddling or solicited illegal campaign contributions.

Reno's decision to seek a seventh independent counsel for a high-ranking member of the Clinton administration was relayed to a special court late yesterday and described in a brief court document that was made public.

Complicating Reno's decision was the fact that prosecutors and FBI agents during five months of preliminary inquiry have neither corroborated a range of allegations made by a businessman against Herman nor found other evidence to question her actions, Justice Department officials said.

The primary allegation was that, as a White House aide, Herman took kickbacks for helping a friend's clients. Herman has denied any wrongdoing.

President Clinton maintained his confidence in Herman, "and in her ability to set whatever these allegations are behind her," White House spokesman Mike McCurry said yesterday. "She's doing a spectacular job as secretary of labor."

"I think the president understands what it's like to be nibbled at by an independent counsel, so it's a fact of life rather than something to become overly preoccupied with," McCurry said, adding that Clinton had not talked to Reno about the case.

Some Justice officials recommended Reno request appointment of an outside prosecutor because the independent

Attorney to receive 9th JFK award

BOSTON (AP) — A part-time county attorney in Montana who prosecuted members of the Freemen militia movement in spite of death threats is the ninth winner of the John F. Kennedy Profile in Courage award.

Nicholas C. Murnion, the only lawyer in Garfield County, Mont., was chosen by a 13-member panel, the John F. Kennedy Library Foundation announced yesterday.

Members of the late president's family will present Murnion with the $25,000 award at a ceremony at the Kennedy Library and Museum on May 29, Kennedy's birthday.

In a telephne interview today, Murnion shared credit with "other residents of Garfield County who also have shown remarkable courage in standing up to the Freemen."

Murnion said President Kennedy's daughter, Caroline Kennedy, notified him of the award by telephone about a month ago.

"A voice comes on and says, 'This is Caroline Kennedy, and...' Finally I had to ask, 'Are you THE Caroline Kennedy?'" Murnion, 44, was elected Garfield County attorney in 1979 and is seeking his sixth term in the part-time position to serve an electorate of 1,500.

Freemen members rejected the U.S. government and its laws, claimed they had sovereign rights, set up their own courts of law and printed their own money orders.

They tried public officials in absentia and in March 1994, posted a $1 million bounty for the arrest and conviction of Murnion and others involved in foreclosing on the property of a member. They threatened to hang those found guilty.

Murnion began prosecuting members of the Freemen, charging them with various felonies including "criminal syndicalism," a state law making it a felony to belong to a group that promotes violence or terrorism to accomplish political ends.

He obtained convictions in the three Freemen cases he prosecuted, including the first conviction under the syndicalism law.

Several defendants became fugitives and established an armed camp, leading to an 81-day standoff with the FBI in 1996. Five Freemen were convicted of felonies this year, and 14 others face trial this month.

Israel objects to peace talk terms

By Barry Schweid
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Trying to overcome Israel's rejection of U.S. terms for Mideast peace talks, President Clinton directed Secretary of State Madeleine Albright to meet here tomorrow with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

The terms — including a pullback from 13 percent of the West Bank — have not changed, administration officials said yesterday. Where there evidently is room for bargaining is how a withdrawal of Israeli troops may be implemented.

Clinton decided to try again after meeting with Albright, national security adviser Sandy Berger and U.S. mediator Dennis Ross. He said he regretted the peace talks were not opening yesterday as planned.

Netanyahu already was coming to Washington to his case to American Jews and Congress. In Jerusalem, Netanyahu said that "at the end of the day, in matters of security, it is Israel that must decide, and I think this is the view shared by, frankly, the people of America and I would like to believe also the government of the United States."

The purpose of Albright's discussions with the Israeli leader "will be to seek to overcome the remaining differences so we proceed immediately with accelerated permanent status talks," Clinton said in a statement.

The U.S. terms for a peace conference and the projected starting date were set last week after Albright failed in meetings with Netanyahu in London to persuade him to agree to a 13 percent withdrawal.

Ross then went to the Middle East and proposed a series of "refinements," but was unable to persuade Netanyahu to change his mind.

The prime minister has signaled he is willing to yield 11 percent but contends giving up more would jeopardize the security of some Jewish settlements on the West Bank, where 155,000 Jews live among 2 million Arabs.

Trying to allay these concerns, State Department spokesman James P. Rubin said yesterday that Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat had "dramatically increased procedures for fighting terrorists." Rubin said the measures included arrest of militants and dismantling the terrorist infrastructure in areas already under the control of Arafat's Palesunian Authority.

Clinton said Albright would report to him after her talks with Netanyahu to determine whether there was a basis for launching a peace conference.

"Unfortunately, there will not be a meeting today with Prime Minister Netanyahu and Chairman (Yasser) Arafat to launch the permanent status talks," Clinton said. "I regret that." White House spokesman Mike McCurry sought to defuse tensions. Asked whether Clinton was exasperated with the prime minister, McCurry said, "This is not about frustration, anger, exasperation. This is about persistence."

McCurry said peace in the area depends on the outcome. Rubin, meanwhile, again raised the option of reassessing the U.S. mediation role if the current effort fails.

"This cannot go on forever," the spokesman said. He added, however, that the United States "cannot dictate to Israel its security needs."

US supports international pledge to fight tobacco use among teens

By Philip Waller
Associated Press

GENEVA — The United States yesterday backed the fight against teen-age smoking pledged by the woman almost certain to become the next head of the United Nations health agency.

Washington will "encourage and enthusiastically support" World Health Organization efforts to control tobacco use among teen-agers, said Donna E. Shalala, U.S. secretary of health and human services.

Former Norwegian Prime Minister Gro Harlem Brundtland said Sunday she would make it a priority to help governments handle tobacco-related problems in Asia, where consumption is increasing. "Tobacco has to be addressed and fought now because the children and young people of Asia are becoming influenced," Brundtland said.

Brundtland, a 58-year-old doctor and public health specialist, is expected to be confirmed as the organization's new director-general tomorrow at the annual meeting of the 191-member World Health Assembly.

The anti-smoking lobby has criticized American tobacco companies, which face legal curbs in the United States, for trying to profit from the burgeoning market in Asia and elsewhere. Washington is not trying to control American tobacco companies' sales abroad with its support for international anti-smoking efforts, Shalala told U.S. and Swiss businessmen in Geneva. But the United States wants its foreign policy to be consistent with its commitment to protect U.S. children, she said.

The U.N. health agency has faced criticism for being preoccupied with internal problems and for having a lack of focus. Opponents of outgoing Director-General Hiroshi Nakajima of Japan, have accused him of bad management and of being a poor communicator.

when one squealer tried to tell them Flemmi and Bulger offered him money to kill an Oklahoma businessman, according to testimony. That squealer later took a bullet. A lot of bullets.

The relationship between the FBI and Bulger and Flemmi is at the center of long pretrial hearings in a racketeering case in federal court in Boston.

The case began with the arrest of Flemmi, reputed local boss Francis "Cadillac Frank" Salemme and other top mobsters on charges of racketeering and extortion. But the case was thrown into chaos with the disclosures that Bulger and Flemmi had been informants for most of the years they were making headlines as bad guys.

Now, before the mob trial can even begin, a judge is trying to decide if the relationship invalidates the case, and perhaps other prosecutions like it.

At the heart of the matter is Flemmi's claim that he and Bulger were told by the FBI they could do anything short of "clipping someone" without fear of prosecution. If Flemmi can prove he was promised immunity, a judge could toss out the 1995 racketeering indictments against him and Bulger.

And it wouldn't stop there.

Defense attorneys want get-out-of-jail-free cards handed to dozens of other Irish and Italian mobsters snared by potentially illegal FBI wiretaps — wiretaps that may be tainted by relationship between Flemmi and his FBI handlers.

A Flemmi victory could overturn New England's most important federal racketeering convictions of the past 15 years, paving the way for new trials for the likes of New England Mafia boss Raymond "Junior" Patriarca of Providence and Boston mob boss Gennaro "Jerry" Angiulo, both serving long sentences in federal prisons.

The story of Bulger and Flemmi goes back a long time. Back to the bloody gang wars of the 1960s, when they were young, brash punks making names for themselves on the parochial streets of South Boston.

Raised in the projects, Bulger was a tough kid from a large, old-fashioned Irish-Catholic family. While his younger brother, Billy, took the straight road, becoming a state representative and eventually president of the Massachusetts Senate, Whitey Bulger walked a crooked path.

Stolen cars, dope, gambling and finally bank robbery kept him in and out of jail.

He and Flemmi were known to authorities as part of the Winter Hill Gang, a motley crew of hoods of Italian and Irish descent headquartered in the blue-collar city of Somerville just north of Boston. They were renegades, although they had connections to the more established crime families in Boston's North End.

counsel law requires that step when she is unable to resolve any specific, credible allegations of federal felonies within 150 days, said department sources, speaking on condition of anonymity.

Other Justice officials apparently doubted that the remaining unresolved matters were specific and credible enough to require an independent counsel.

Attorneys for Herman were still providing information to the department on Friday. Reno discussed the case in meetings with key aides on the deadline day, yesterday.

If Reno asks a special three-judge court to select an independent counsel, it would be the seventh independent counsel she has requested. She previously had counsels named to investigate Clinton, four of his Cabinet members — since-deceased Commerce Secretary Ron Brown, former Housing Secretary Henry Cisneros, former Agriculture Secretary Mike Espy and Interior Secretary Bruce Babbitt — and former White House aide Eli Segal.

In early March, Reno advised the court that her investigators needed more time to analyze "voluminous records... not received until late in the preliminary investigation."

"Other records and witnesses are still not available to us, although we have a reasonable belief that we may be able to obtain access in the near future," she wrote then.

After that, time was lost because a key FBI agent on the case was promoted to other work and a replacement had to be brought up to speed, according to people familiar with the probe.

Reno confirmed that "the principal allegation under investigation is whether Secretary Herman had a hidden financial interest in a business partially owned by her friend, Vanessa Weaver."

Herman is accused of having arranged to get a kickback on Weaver's consulting fees in return for helping her clients while Herman was a Clinton aide and head of the White House Public Liaison Office from 1994 to 1996 before she moved to the Labor Department, lawyers in the case have said.

"The secretary... knows that she does not have a hidden financial interest in Dr. Weaver's business," Neil Eggleston, Herman's lawyer, said in March.

Herman allegedly helped someone obtain a Federal Communications Commission license for a satellite telephone system. Another allegation is that she schemed to funnel foreign donations to the Democratic Party.

The allegations were brought to the government last October by Laurent Yene, a 42-year-old businessman from Africa.

Yene told investigators and news organizations that he, Herman and Weaver had a secret arrangement to use Herman's White House influence. Weaver is a close friend of Herman to whom she sold her consulting firm after joining the administration. Herman allegedly was to get 10 percent of Weaver's consulting fees.

COMPUTER PRESERVATION SOCIETY

SAVE A COMPUTER!

Every year, millions of homeless computers are sent to "Recycling Centers" where they are stripped, subjected to the removal of their vital parts, and melted down for the precious metals they contain...

You can help! UStore is putting up for "adoption" dozens of computers and pieces of hardware which it has been sheltering for the past year. Among these refugees are brand new and demo computers (386 to Pentium), peripherals, and more. UStore can no longer afford to harbor these unfortunate computers, but we're trying to find a good home for each and every one.

Visit our adoption centers in UStore and the Campus Center for a complete listing.

To encourage people to adopt these computers, UStore has arranged to reduce the already low "adoption" fees by 30%. That's right, you can:

Israel's next 50: peace?

The 50th anniversary of the establishment of the State of Israel has been a surprisingly subdued affair. The guests of honor — the passions that such a milestone was expected to provoke on both sides of the conflict — have been conspicuously absent.

Israeli commemorations, as Ran Kislev pointed out in Israel's leading daily Ha'aretz, have been "primarily somber, not proud or hopeful." They were characterized mainly by anxiety, ambivalence, and division, with repeated outbursts of the profound loathing that has emerged between Orthodox and secular Israelis, and between supporters of the expansion or consolidation of the Israeli state.

Kislev correctly observes that "there is no national unity, nor can there ever be in this long-standing cultural war... which is no longer a potential threat but which is rather being conducted in our very midst at full throttle." Especially shocking were the bitter and at times violent conflicts that accompanied a number of ceremonies to honor fallen Israeli soldiers.

Darker still is the lingering shadow that the Palestinian people cast over any Israeli triumphalism. After 101 years of Zionism and 50 years of Israel, they remain in existence, stubbornly clinging to every tuft of grass, every handful of gravel of Palestine they still possess. For all they have suffered, the Palestinians have refused to melt away into some undifferentiated Arab swamp as the Zionists hoped.

From its early origins in the slogan "a land without a people for a people without a land," to Golda Meir's infamous 1969 declaration that "There was no such thing as Palestinians... they did not exist," the Zionist movement disregarded and denied the existence of the Palestinians.

Such claims are no longer possible. Triumphalist crowing has given way to throat-clearing. In the past few weeks the op-ed pages of all the leading Israeli newspapers have featured articles acknowledging the dispossession of the Palestinians by the Zionist movement, which all sought by one implausible contortion or another to blame the victims. One detects an increasingly gnawing recognition, buried deep in the breast of even the most self-satisfied Zionist, that there is something here that needs to be rationalized, blamed on others or explained away.

But, there is simply no room left to deny that whatever Israelis gained in the last 50 years has been

"Darker still is the lingering shadow that the Palestinian people cast over any Israeli triumphalism."

Hussein Ibish

at the ongoing expense of other people.

Meanwhile the Palestinians have reacted to the 50th anniversary of their dispossession with a muted mourning and a quiet determination to continue to resist. There has been very little evidence of bitter recrimination or anger in their reaction. After a century of struggle in which they have lost their nation, been massacred and driven into exile, and seen their towns taken over or eradicated by bulldozers, there is little reason to feel that the end is in sight.

There is only one solution that can lead to a peaceful future, and everyone knows it. The Palestinians demand it, international law demands it, peace and justice demand it, the United Nations demands it, the European Union demands it, Shimon Peres and Leah Rabin demand it, even Hillary Clinton demands it. A fully-fledged independent Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza is required in almost everyone's interests.

There is only one other long-term scenario — the ethnic cleansing of Palestinians from the West Bank in the context of a generalized conflict and its annexation by Israel.

There are plenty of Israelis who would welcome this option, including a several, if not many, in Prime Minister Netanyahu's cabinet. Indeed this seems to be the only end-game that can be attached to Netanyahu's attitude.

The "Interim Accord" of September 1995 committed Israel to a withdrawal from almost all of the West Bank and Gaza, except for Jerusalem, the settlements and some military posts, which should have been completed long ago. Netanyahu opposed those accords, and since his election has attempted to dismantle them. His top aides ecstatically boasted to the Israeli daily Ma'ariv that the current dispute with the United States proves that they have succeeded in "smashing Oslo." Quibbling over percentages is all but meaningless when Israel is using every excuse, delaying and stalling tactic it can find to block anything which might lead to independence for Palestinians.

Having already "smashed Oslo," Netanyahu may well ultimately agree to the American plan. And Yassir Arafat, who has left himself with very few options, might feel forced to accept anything the Israelis offer him. The Palestinian people, however, will never be satisfied with any arrangement that denies them their basic human and national rights, and, instead of peace, the struggle will go on.

Israel stands at a crossroads which is extraordinarily well-defined. Bibi's own actions have drawn the distinctions more starkly than ever. It can choose peace by accepting the emergence of the Palestinian state. Or, it can sentence itself and everyone else in the region to an indefinite conflict which is likely to make the past 50 years look like a garden party. the consequences of which are literally unimaginable.

Next year, the term of the Interim agreement will be over. It will be time. Whatever the situation on the ground, whatever the positions the Israeli and American governments take, it will be time. There is no other choice. Let the chips fall where they may. Calmly, reasonably, without fanfare or tears, Arafat and the Palestinian leadership must declare statehood in 1999.

Our fine feathered friends

You've read all those All I Ever Needed to Know I Learned from... books, right? Or maybe you've seen that whole shtick on a poster or a T-shirt or something (to be honest, I think the only actual book is the one about kindergarten by So And So).

Well, I've been here a whole year now, and I think I've been enlightened. By professors? Well, somewhat, but not especially (I've learned a lot of information, but I wouldn't call it "enlightening" me as such). By friends or relatives? No, although my friends are the grooviest. My relatives are pretty groovy, too, but they're in Maine, so they haven't had enough direct contact to enlighten me.

Seth Koenig

No, in fact, I've come to a greater understanding of life with the tutelage of the greatest minds on campus: the UMass ducks.

You know who they are. They're the waddling little characters who hang out by the campus pond, and they have a lot more knowledge than one might think.

Here now, the piece of writing I will call, "All I Needed to Know in Life I Learned from the UMass Campus Ducks."

- Being wet below the belt can be a good thing.
- Even though the dining commons bread is stiff, it's very often all that's available.
- Although New England winters are tough, the beauty is worth staying for.
- Swans have bad attitudes.
- Babies will always attract more attention than their proud parents, even though it's the parents who do all the work.
- If you want something, beat the competition away from it and take it.
- If you want a donation from a higher authority (say, bread from a picnicker), be annoying until they submit.
- You can get high with just air.
- Sleep wherever you feel like, don't always return home for the night (try the parking lot).
- Make a lot of noise if you feel like it, or don't mutter a word if you'd rather.
- The Collegian ink can kill you if you take in too much of it at once.
- Sometimes it's better to walk away when others are angry at you.
- Other times, it's useful to slap them around a little bit.
- If you dislike someone, don't hang out with that one.
- Start quacking pointlessly for a while. You might say something really worthwhile, eventually.
- You can't get into something without getting your feet wet first, and you can't get a lot accomplished without sticking your head in all the way.
- Wash frequently.
- If you want a female to like you, be nice. She probably won't take too kindly to being jumped on.
- If a male is pursuing you that you think is disgusting, hide somewhere for a while. He'll probably forget and pursue someone else soon.
- If a big, loud, sketchy creature is headed at you, go in the other direction.
- The only thing most protesters accomplish is getting in the way as you try to get around the Campus Center.
- Always go places with friends, because if you encounter danger, they'll be there to help you out.
- Make long distance trips through the air. It cuts down on time, maintenance, technicalities, and overall problems.
- Good people will always share their food with you when you don't have any.
- Jimmy Hoffa is NOT at the bottom of the campus pond, and neither is Elvis.
- Who cares if he is?
- Delicious food can make your worries go away, but nauseating food will make your life miserable. You have to eat, though, one way or another.
- Spend time with your children. They'll grow up and kick your butt if they don't like you.
- Slow down while coming to a stop, or you won't know what hit you when your body actually comes to rest; physically or mentally.

Take this advice to heart. If you have any legitimate questions, go to the pond and ask a duck.

Changes in attitude?

After spending much of last spring counting the days until I say sayonara to the Valley, I have come to the conclusion that my insular life here at UMass isn't such a bad thing after all. Too bad there's less than two weeks until it's all over.

Marty Keane
Class of 1998

In many respects (i.e.: academic work), I'm more than ready to hang it up. In nearly every other respect, though, the next couple of weeks are going to be my own personal hell. Moving on and saying goodbye is never easy, especially when you live 900 miles from all the friends you've made over the last four years.

Hailing from Chicago, going away to school meant completely starting over for me. Instead of playing it safe and following a group of friends and high school classmates to Big Ten schools around the Midwest, I rolled the dice, went for broke, and chose UMass. I was — I think for the better — forced to learn how to survive on my own without the safety net of being able to drive two hours for a taste of mom's cooking and parental reassurance.

While my first semester at UMass now seems like a lifetime ago, the memories and experiences are still as fresh as the day they were formed.

I remember back to the fall of '94 and recall the surprisingly easy transition into college life. I had spent the entire summer worrying about how I was going to lose touch with all my friends back home, being so far away from them, not to mention what life was going to be like when I returned home.

I'd never been away from home for any length of time and the thought of it sent a nervous quiver through my body. I was fully expecting to have an ill feeling in my stomach and be homesick, but it never happened. The reason: I was simply too busy to think about being away from home. Besides a full load of classes, I was meeting new people and relishing in the fact that no one was there to tell me what to do. Ever. If I wanted to do it, I did it — within reason, of course. Those days, unfortunately, are coming to a close.

And here's what I've finally decided about UMass: It's not a perfect school, but then again, nowhere is. If I had my way, I would have liked to have gone somewhere a little less obsessive and overly sensitive about political correctness. I won't deny it's been frustrating being a Republican in such a liberal pocket of society, especially when the word "Republican" has a connotation akin to the anti-Christ at UMass. Considering the actions of most who affiliate themselves with the GOP on this campus, though, I'm not at all surprised.

I look back on my four years here as wholly worthwhile. I've achieved nearly every goal I set for myself when I arrived here: graduate in four years, study abroad, get into law school, double major. When I compare myself to what I was back then — a naive, close-minded freshman — to what I have become — a cynical, enlightened senior — I can't believe I'm the same person living in the same body.

Still, reflecting back on all the changes that have happened to me and around me over the last four years, I've begun to realize that the more things change, the more they stay the same. Consider the following:

- Then: The UMass men's basketball team was up-and- coming power with a young team and tons of potential.

Now: The UMass men's basketball team is a re-emerging power with a young team and tons of potential.

- Then: I thought the term "liberal" was a dirty word.

Now: Nowadays, I don't think being a liberal is such a bad thing. I just think it's shortsighted.

- Then: The buildings on-campus were in a horrible state of disrepair.

Now: The buildings on-campus are in a horrible state of disrepair.

- Then: Michael Jordan was retired from basketball, playing minor league baseball down in Birmingham, Ala.

Now: MJ is back where he belongs, playing for the World Champion Chicago Bulls. I hope he doesn't have to retire again.

- Then: Our country had a shady character in the White House who's being investigated by Kenneth Starr for questionable dealings with Monica Lewinsky, Linda Tripp and Kathleen Willey.

- Then: Marcus Camby was considered to be a great physical specimen who needed to bulk up and learn more post moves.

Now: The Toronto Raptors brass are scratching their collective heads and thinking the same thing.

Perhaps the only constant in my life over these four years has been my favorite television show, "Seinfeld." On Thursday, that'll change. If Jerry can turn down millions to stay put, I suppose I can move on, too.

Campus beautification 101

One year ago a Collegian cartoon expressed the widely held view of campus beautification as "duct tape." Each one of us has ideas about replacing the fence around the library, or removing some concrete in front of the Fine Arts Center, and replacing it with some trees, benches, or anything human-scale.

As a student in the Landscape Architecture Department, and a typical resident on this campus, I am genuinely concerned about the renovation and maintenance of our outdoor landscape spaces. As a student, I am also concerned about the development of educational opportunities involving students. I propose the integration of these two trusts.

Susan Humphries, who worked with the Learning Through Landscapes Project in England, wrote, "It is sad to reflect that the most impoverished of immediate personal landscapes, from the child's point of view, is that of the school environs. We have in the main been willing to accept a bleak informality — easily mown grass, tarmac, and the occasional rose bed — as the setting for education and other public institutions. We should rather be offering children aesthetic delight in their school grounds, places of color, richness, and diversity which may be used for recreational purposes, imaginative play and for learning. The scope for environmental education 'on the doorstep' is enormous."

Professional landscape architects hold themselves responsible for the creation of meaningful and environmentally responsible outdoor spaces. Our department of Landscape Architecture is virtually unknown to the general student body. Many of our students' creative designs are discarded, or remain trapped on a piece of paper or in a model from our basement.

Why not apply our studies, and contribute to the renovation and revitalization of our college environment, making changes instead of waiting for someone else to realize them? Students should be involved in the campus planning process. Already, they have been involved in the construction of several designed spaces, such as the French Hall Seating Area, the Bartlett Hall Garden, and the most recent project,

"The concept is simple: students learn the skills they need by applying them to their own environment, and in doing so, change their campus landscape for the better."

Andrew Port

just outside the library ramp. "If we don't take children seriously and give them the opportunity to take themselves seriously, we are endangering our own future," wrote Rodger Hart.

Last fall, I wrote a proposal in Junior Year Writing... an average homework assignment. I envisioned an annual course for senior landscape architecture students to design landscape spaces on their own campus, for Stockbridge students to assist in the construction, planting, and maintenance of these gardens, and for art students to ornament them with sculpture, tiles, murals, banners, and other media.

The concept is simple: students learn the skills they need by applying them to their own environment, and in doing so, change their campus landscape for the better.

By the suggestion of my professor, Annaliese Bischoff, the proposal was sent to the Honors Department, where I was granted a Research Fellowship. I worked with faculty mentor Michael Davidsohn, from the Department of Landscape Architecture, who designed both the French Hall Seating Area and the new seating area outside the library ramp. The proposal won an award last week, at the Undergraduate Research, Scholarly, Creative, and Public Services Activities Conference in Boston. Each person who I have discussed the proposal with expresses the same enthusiasm and interest in the proposed program.

What was originally a homework assignment has evolved into a thesis and proposal to numerous departments on this campus to adopt a new course and campus beautification project. These departments include: Landscape Architecture, Stockbridge, Art, Campus Beautification, Campus Planning, and Grounds Management. It is the big idea that has brought any measure of success, because it simply makes sense. All of the resources exist for this endeavor to be implemented on our campus.

This approach to campus beautification and renovation can be a highlight of our landscape, research and educational opportunities. It is students like us whose college years will be most affected by the reception or stagnation of this proposal. If the proposal is successful, a committee will be formed next semester to form a concrete outline for this program, based on the recommendations.

The life and death of this plan depends on open and ambitious student, faculty, and administrative leaders. If you feel you or your department may have something to contribute, contact your department head; voice your approval and support, while it is still gaining momentum.

A Massive dose of innovation creates album of semester

MEZZANINE
Massive Attack
Virgin

The best music is never a reaction to a trend or movement. It instead looks forward and sets the standard for all other contemporaries to aim for. Think of the most credible musicians of the modern era in an artistic sense: the Velvet Underground, the Beatles, Bowie, Pink Floyd, the Stooges. Each made music that didn't attach itself to a pre-existing formula and work to refine and perfect its sound. Rather, they set the standard for others to follow by creating the blueprints.

Many have tried to copy the Beatles, but no one has succeeded in surpassing the Fab Four because, given the choice, anyone with half a brain will still gravitate toward the original over the copycat. It makes perfect sense.

Such is the case with Bristol, England's Massive Attack. Originally a group of like-minded DJ's, the group formed out of the remnants of the Wild Bunch crew — amongst them Tricky, Neneh Cherry and Geoff Barrow of Portishead.

With their 1991 debut Blue Lines, Massive Attack singularly re-defined non-techno dance and British soul with a body of songs that to this day sound as fresh and innovative as they did almost a decade ago. Since then, Tricky and Portishead, each who have had more success than Massive Attack in gaining a foothold Stateside, have emerged in their own right as credible artists. Still, they will always lurk in a Massive shadow.

On Mezzanine, the Bristol, England-based group progresses uneasily towards a richer, more complex musical vision. Considering the album is wrought with the paranoid musings of someone who's neither here nor there, the title is a logical one. Played through, Mezzanine sounds just what the title implies. The eleven songs are a journey, with a strong recurring feeling of movement throughout and the unease that goes with it. The theme of transition and the paranoia that comes along with it are everywhere on Mezzanine. Massive Attack are clearly in the midst of an engaging transformation from that of the collection of electronic wizards who turned the world onto trip-hop into a group preparing for the uncertain by obsessing about it. Simply put, it makes for a fascinating listening experience.

For starters, there's the abrasive guitar layers that underpin reggae legend Horace Andy's soaring vocals on the opening "Angel." It's the sound of someone trapped in their own personal hell trying to worm their way out by crying out to those above.

"Risingson" is a brilliant, albeit disturbing, meditation on the duality of drug psychosis and the late night culture of club life. The duelling vocals of Daddy Gee and 3D provide for some intriguing lyrical interplay. "Toylike people make me boylike" has endless possibilities into its meaning.

As always, the boys in Massive have enlisted several of their lady friends to sing on their twisted instrumentals backbones. Cocteau Twins' Liz Fraser weaves a magical spell on "Teardrop" while Sara Jay performs the stirring "Dissolved Girl." Both are heartbreaking in their emotive energy, a feat unseen in any electronic music genre since Shara Nelson's turn on "Unfinished Symphony," off Blue Lines.

Lasting, memorable music always comes from somewhere else, but still manages to comment on the greater society in which it exists. Like Radiohead's OK Computer and Pulp's This Is Hardcore, Massive Attack gaze skeptically at where we are as a global community in this pre-millenial age. The picture they paint is bleak and dreary, and for good reason. Who among us truly believes that all is fine and dandy with the world? And besides, a hearty dose of sobering realism has always been a key ingredient for making great music.

The only fault one can find with Mezzanine is that they've done all this before. They've already broke all the rules and made new ones. The album of the semester? Easily. The album of the year? Most likely. The album of the decade? Sorry, they've already made it. A

Daytime's best and brightest stars

It's about that time again when daytime's best and brightest get the r-e-s-p-e-c-t they so rightly deserve (you try to remember ten pages of dialogue within the span of ten or so hours... I can't even remember what day it is). Of course I'm referring to the millionth annual Daytime Emmys which is set to air this Friday at 9 p.m. If you thought the Oscars were a hoot (who's wearing what), just wait until you see daytime's studs and studettes strut their stuff down the catwalk and yes... that's the piece of gold that continues to elude Susan Lucci's grasp.

My friends and moi throw an Emmy bash almost every year to celebrate the occasion. Friends, food, and soaps, does it get any better than that. In case you're curious, no, we have no lives. Seriously though, it's such fun. I wish you could all join us. The party won't be without it's share of flying fur now that we have a battle brewing between the Days and GH fanatics. I prefer to stay neutral. Whatever your soap preference, if you have some time to kill on Friday night, give it a shot.

In case you find yourself glued to the set Friday night, I thought I'd run down the list of nominees and give you our picks as to who will take home and who deserves to take home the gold this year. The "Blue Ribbon" panel for this year's picks includes Jeremy, Gina, Mimi, Cathy, Beth, Susanne, Dave and of course me. The difference between us and the Emmy's "distinguished" panel is that we actually watch the soaps. Our opinions aren't based on a fifteen minute clip of an actor's performance but on an entire year's worth. Here's the results:

Best Show:
- GH
- Y&R
- Days
- AMC

Who will win. Quite a few of us think that GH will walk away with the gold this year but my money's on Y&R. The show's always been a panel fave and GH has won the title three years in a row. Third time's a charm, fourth isn't.

Who deserves it: The winner is... GH but before you go crying foul play you'd be surprised as to who I thought earned it... Days. Let's not forget GH's rough transition between writers earlier last year when the show teetered on the edge of a creative disaster (The "Tin Man" story, Katherine's paralysis, etc, etc). What's the best show now, GH. What was the best show last year, Days.

Best Actress:
- Eileen Davidson (Susan, Kristin, Days)
- Cynthia Watros (Annie, GL)
- Kim Zimmer (pre-clone, Reva, GL)
- Jacklyn Zeeman (Bobbie, GH)
- Susan Lucci (Erica, AMC)

Who will win: By an overwhelming majority, the panel chose Eileen Davidson. I'd have to go with Jacklyn Zeeman.

Who deserves it: Once again, Eileen Davidson. I couldn't agree more although choosing between these gems was no easy task.

Best Actor:
- Anthony Geary (Luke, GH)
- Kin Shriner (Scott, PC)
- Peter Bergman (Jack, Y&R)
- Adam Canary (Adam, Stuart, AMC)
- Eric Braeden (Victor, Y&R)

Who will win : The panel and I think that Anthony Geary might steal it. If Eric Braeden wins it, I swear I'm going to vomit. I apologize for the candidness but this guy's got the versatility of a wall.

Who deserves it: Drake Hogestyn (John, Days) deserves it — just joking — but since he wasn't nominated I guess we'll have to go with Anthony Geary once again. It wasn't exactly his strongest year but the other nominees didn't exactly have a stellar year either.

Best Supporting Actress:
- Julia Barr (Brooke, AMC)
- Vanessa Marcil (Brenda, GH)
- Amy Eckland (Abby, GL)
- Amy Carlson (Josie, AW)
- Victoria Rowell (Dru, Y&R)

Who will win it: Vanessa Marcil is neck and neck with Amy Eckland on this one. It really could go either way. Don't count out Victoria Rowell just yet... she's the wild card in this battle.

Who deserves it: Vanessa Marcil and Julia Barr tied for this one. In my opinion, Vanessa had a much stronger year and if anyone's entitled to a little recognition, it's this woman.

Best Supporting Actor:
- Michael E. Knight (Tad, AMC)
- Ian Buchanan (James, B&B)
- Steve Burton (Jason, GH)
- Grant Alexander (Phillip, GL)
- Scott Reeves (Ryan, Y&R)

Who will win it: The panel all agrees, Steve Burton is the one to beat.

Who deserves it: Steve Burton. He's been nothing but superb this past year and has really come into his own. The scene when Robin and Jason called it quits was one of the most heart wrenching scenes in recent memory and Steve was absolutely fab.

There's a few other titles up for grabs but these are pretty much the cream of the crop. Well, folks, it's my last article of the semester and I have to say, it's been fun. You've all been absolute darlings, allowing me to indulge in my obsession (some people shoot heroin, I watch soaps).

Hopefully, when I return from my internship at Soap Opera Weekly this summer, I'll be able to add some more spice to the column in the form of interviews with the stars and insider info (contacts, contacts, contacts).

Before I leave, I'd like to take a moment to thank all those who have contributed to the column in one way or the other. My Blue Wall posse, AMC ladies Cathy and Karen: Love dishing the soaps with you gals. Susanne: My heart of the ocean... no one can bitch like we can. Dave: My very first and fave GH pal... it's all about me. Jeremy: My fave Days pal... The Blue Wall won't be the same without the two of you. Gina: Where's the real "Hope." Randi: still love you, despite your allegiance to Y&R. Bridget: "Jax" isn't all that, honey... Bonnie and Cheryl: my new flatmates... may way watch GH until the wee hours of the morning. And to... Beth, Jamie, diva (you know who you are... devoted Sonny fan), Mimi, Sarah, Kelley, Caroline, the ladies about me, Jeremy: My fave Days pal... The Blue Wall won't be the same without the two of you. Gina: Where's the real "Hope." Randi: still love you, despite your allegiance to Y&R. Bridget: "Jax" isn't all that, honey... Bonnie and Cheryl: my new flatmates... may way watch GH until the wee hours of the morning. And to... Beth, Jamie, diva (you know who you are... devoted Sonny fan), Mimi, Sarah, Kelley, Caroline, the ladies about me, Jeremy: My fave Days pal... The Blue Wall won't be the same without the two of you. Gina: Where's the real "Hope." Randi: still love you, despite your allegiance to Y&R. Bridget: "Jax" isn't all that, honey... Bonnie and Cheryl: my new flatmates... may way watch GH until the wee hours of the morning. And to... Beth, Jamie, diva (you know who you are... devoted Sonny fan), Mimi, Sarah, Kelley, Caroline, the ladies about me. Thanks for reading the Collegian!

Cats scampers its way into Mullins

Cats
May 8, 9,10
Mullins Center

The world's most popular musical, Cats, scampered its way into the spotlight this weekend at the Mullins Center.

Using cats as narrators for their own stories, we are given a glimpse of the mysteries of cat life. The premise of this cat gathering is the Jellicle Ball, which happens once a year, in the light of the Jellicle moon.

We are told the ineffable names of cats, the ones which usually we (humans) can never know. This musical delves deep into the strange underworld of cats, and it will change the way you look at cats forever.

Introduced in scene five, the story of Grizabella, The Glamour Cat, is by far the most moving and powerful. After being hit by a car, she is physically destroyed and shunned by her peers. Her story of woe is brilliantly captured in the last scene of act one through the show's most well known song, Memory. Her mournful and soulful lament of loneliness silenced the entire cast and audience this weekend.

But the full beauty of the piece was not attained until the end of act two when Grizabella, in a final and seemingly futile attempt at contact with the other cats, is unable to finish the song on her own and is vocally supported by the sweet voice of Jilabub. This one small gesture revitalizes Grizabella's song and encourages the other cats to look upon the ailing cat with compassion.

Almost the entire text of the musical was adapted from T.S. Eliot's Old Possum's Book of Practical Cats (1939). A few have been subject to a minor revision of tense or pronoun and eight lines have been added to "The Song of the Jellicles." According to Trevor Nunn, who adapted the lyrics, The Marching Song of the Pollicle Dogs and the story of Grizabella were discovered among the unpublished writings of Eliot. The prologue is based on ideas and incorporates lines from another unpublished poem, "Pollicle Dogs and Jellicle Cats." Growltiger's aria is taken from an Italian translation of Practical Cats.

The entertaining genius of this musical lies in the translation from Eliot's book to today's audience, like tap dancing cockroaches, the Elvis look-alike (the Rum Tum Tugger), and the feline reincarnation of the Andrews Sisters. Unlike many other Broadway shows, Cats has not produced any superstars, but rather it is known for the brilliance of its ensemble, and the way in which all of the characters work together as a whole. For the show, the performers seem to become cats. Beautifully and imaginatively, they translate the graceful, elegant and efficient movement of cats into human form.

The final words of Memory marked the end of the Jellicle meeting and their nocturnal element. As the show comes to a close, in the final songs, the voices of the ensemble blend beautifully, a perfect closure of these cat tales. And the audience is left with a moral, best stated by the old Deuteronomy, "Cats are very much like you."

The future of microphone is bright

This is my last column ever, and contrary to popular belief it's a depressing thought. Throughout my three year career at the Collegian they have always allowed me to write about whatever I want. Giving me a voice, which I can use to communicate to over twenty thousand kids — I really consider this to be a blessing. Every week I have been able to come down to the bowels of the campus center and speak on what I want to, a truly unique experience. I'm going to try and wrap up things here, like Seinfeld, it's coming to an end.

In terms of Urban Sounds, I hope that this column was helpful to all of you who took the time to read it. My main goal was to expose the underground side of hip-hop, the side that you don't see on MTV. I've always loved hardcore, because to me hardcore means the artists who love their work regardless of what genre they are in.

To me hip-hop is not about flashy cars, drugs, guns, and scantily clad women. Hip-hop is mix tapes, ciphers, graffiti, break dancing, the real nitty-gritty. Hip-hop, like my column for me, has given thousands of young artists a chance to be heard. Whether it was through their scratching, beat boxing, battling, they expressed their own individuality. That's why I consider my article to be in the true spirit of hip-hop. At the end of the day hip-hop is what you love, I love my column.

I hope that through reading my column you got to laugh and learn about artists you might not have ever heard of. Here's a little wrap up of what I considered to be the best of this semester.

Best DJ: Roc Raida
Album: Moment of Truth — Gang Starr
MC: Rakim
MC Battle: Cannibus vs. LL Cool J, with Cannibus emerging as the clear winner.
Mix Tape: Return To The Old School — Roc Raida
Mix CD: Reality Check Hip-Hip 101 — Premier
Single: Body Rock — Q-Tip, Mos Def, Tesla
Rookie of The Year: Mos Def
Comeback of The Year: Public Enemy
MVP: DJ Premier

There are a ton of other DJs and MCs who have made tremendous artistic efforts this year and deserve to be mentioned. MCs like DMX, Cannibus, I-Live, Mos Def, Big Punisher, Kwell, along with groups like Jurrasic Five, Black Eyed Peas, and Company Flow have shown us that the future of the microphone is bright. It seems that MCs have a future that is not based on gangster movies. In terms of DJs, all I have to say is thank God for the X-Men and the Invisible Scratch Pickles for keeping things innovative and exciting. Other DJs like Rectangle, Tony Touch, Doo Wop, Babu, and Evil Dee have continued to keep the mix tape scene vital.

Finally I would like to thank some people who have helped make this column possible. My editor Seema, for putting up with me and my column and never telling me to stuff it, my roommates Melissa and Cheryl, Matt Wang, Paul Bell, Mike Willet, and Keith Smith, Jeremy Willis, Jenn MacLea, Hannah and Anna, Mark Santo, Peter Irving, Tom Brennan, Gabe Rosenberg and anyone else I may have forgotten — mad love to all of you DJs Big Phil and Dini for giving me mix tapes to review. Andrew from the Grow Room for keeping me hooked up. Above and beyond all, I'd like to thank anyone who has taken the time to read my article cause you're the ones I'm writing this for. I'd also like to thank all the people I've met in the four years of going to school here cause you've all had an impact on me.

Peace.

Chicago Bulls look to take sting out of Hornets

By Nancy Armour
Associated Press

DEERFIELD, Ill. — The Chicago Bulls won't come right out and say it, but they know. Charlotte coach Dave Cowens and his players do, too.

With a 3-1 lead in their best-of-7 series with the Hornets, all that's left for the Bulls is to finish things off. And that's exactly what they plan to do in Game 5 tomorrow night.

"I think they know it's an uphill battle," Bulls reserve Scott Burrell said yesterday. "They're playing at our place and it's going to be tough for them to try and get a win here."

Burrell doesn't mean to sound cocky or disrespectful. He's just talking cold, hard facts. The Bulls have won 23 straight playoff series in which they led. Except for 1993-94 and 1994-95, when Michael Jordan was off slugging fly balls, the five-time NBA champions haven't lost more than one game in the second round since 1991-92.

Add in the fact Game 5 is back at the United Center, and things don't look so good for Charlotte.

"We've got to beat these guys three in a row. I don't know if anybody's done that since Michael Jordan started playing," Cowens said. "It doesn't look good, but that doesn't mean we're not going to go out there and try. You know — let's win this one and then we get to come back home and then let's try to win that one. That's the way to do it."

Then Cowens paused and smiled.

"This is all short-term planning," he said. "There's no long-term stuff going on."

While the Hornets did steal Game 2 from the Bulls last week, that may as well have been a month ago. Charlotte is weary, and Sunday's 94-80 loss at The Hive didn't help.

The Bulls beat up on the younger Hornets mentally and physically. Glen Rice, Charlotte's leading scorer, is still struggling, while Jordan and Scottie Pippen are in a groove. Dennis Rodman is keeping his cool despite his race with Vlade Divac to see who can drive the other crazy first.

Cowens knows his team is tired and he gave them the day off yesterday after a short film session. But everyone is tired at this time of the year, Cowens said.

The Bulls also took it easy yesterday. Most players headed for the golf course after a brief weightlifting session.

"We've worked too hard to not come and go to war," Cowens said. "Every game is a war, and that's what we have to be prepared for. Naturally they smell blood. We're just going to have to put it in our heads that we're going to go up there and compete as hard as we have.

"We're not eliminated yet, and until we are, we fight hard to do whatever we can to represent ourselves, to represent Charlotte and the NBA."

As for the Bulls, they just want to get this series done. While no one else will admit it — there are a lot of cliches about focus flying around — Luc Longley says he's keeping a close eye on the New York-Indiana series, which the Pacers lead 3-1.

But first, there's Game 5.

And on the off chance the Bulls don't win tomorrow?

"It'd be a real drag," Longley said. "We don't particularly want to go back down to Charlotte, go on another trip and lengthen our season any more than we have to. But there's no given. "Things don't go by the script unfortunately, as we proved in Game 2."

Hobson slowly returns to baseball

By Jenna Halvatgis
Associated Press

FAIRHOPE, Ala. — On most days, Butch Hobson can still be found at the ballpark, wearing his old Boston Red Sox cap with his name smeared in black ink under the bill.

"You're too close to the plate, step back," he yells to one player. "Get your glove under the ball," he tells another. But Fairhope Municipal Stadium is a long way from Boston's Fenway Park and the baseball players he's working with are not Red Sox.

They're little kids.

"I'll give you $5 if you don't swing at the first pitch," he tells 7-year-old son K.C., who still swings at it. "He always does," Hobson says, sighing.

It's been a long fall from grace for the 47-year-old Hobson, the former Red Sox manager who is slowly trying to put his life back together after his 1996 arrest on cocaine charges.

Learning to make a life outside of professional baseball, Hobson has been earning money through clinics and private lessons for children in this well-to-do bayside resort town on Alabama's coast. But with a wife and three young children to support, $25 a lesson doesn't always pay the bills. So Hobson, a Tuscaloosa native, is considering moving his family to New Hampshire to take a public relations job with an oil company.

"It's a good job with a salary and benefits," said Hobson, also a special assignment scout for the Red Sox.

Still, it will be hard for Hobson to leave Fairhope, the community that embraced him when his drug problems were making headlines and leading the nightly newscasts.

A former two-sport star at the University of Alabama, Hobson went on to an eight-year playing career in baseball before managing the Red Sox for three seasons.

He was fired from that job, but picked up by the Philadelphia system, where he managed at Class AAA Scranton-Wilkes Barre, Pa., a job he lost when he was caught in a drug sting.

More than 2 grams of cocaine were delivered to his hotel room in Pawtucket, R.I., where his team was playing. Police were at his door minutes later with a search warrant and found the cocaine in his shaving kit.

He refused to admit guilt but agreed to enter a state program for first-time criminal offenders. To this day, he says he was not expecting the package — sent from a former high school teammate in Birmingham — that was worth about $120.

"It's like you grow up with people and you don't separate yourself from them when you know the things they are into aren't right," he said. "But one day those people are going to go down and when that guy does, he's going to remember your name. That's what happened to me. As athletes, you are targets."

Korda failed in attempt to knock off tennis' No. 1 Pete Sampras

By Victor Simpson
Associated Press

ROME, Italy — Petr Korda got stuck in the clay at the Italian Open yesterday, and quickly lost a chance to regain the No. 1 ranking from Pete Sampras.

In this important tuneup for the French Open, Korda was clearly off his game and was beaten 6-2, 6-4 by Morocco's Hicham Arazi. Korda, the Australian Open champion, was seeded No. 2 and joined No. 5 seed Greg Rusedski and No. 7 Jonas Bjorkman in making early exits from the $2.4 million tournament.

Korda had an outside shot to reach No. 1, provided he reached the final and Sampras was ousted early on.

Sampras plays Tuesday in his latest bid to raise his game in preparation for Paris, the only Grand Slam event played on clay and the only one to elude him.

Rusedski, his big serve slowed on the slow clay of Foro Italico, lost 7-5, 7-6 (10-8) to Bohdan Ulihrach. Bjorkman was eliminated by clay-court specialist Filip Dewulf 6-2, 6-3.

Three former French Open champions — Michael Chang, Gustavo Kuerten and Thomas Muster — advanced.

Two-time French champion Sergi Bruguera quit during his match with Sweden's Magnus Norman while trailing 6-3, 1-0.

Korda, a French Open finalist in 1992, sprayed shots wildly and drew derisive whistles from the center-court crowd.

Arazi, ranked 54th, jumped ahead 6-2, 2-0 before Korda showed signs of life in the match between left-handers.

Korda appeared to regroup by winning four straight games. But then his game betrayed him again, and the Moroccan reeled off the last four games. It was Korda's second straight early exit on clay against a low-ranking player.

Want to fill this space next year?

Student comic submissions are currently being accepted for consideration for a space in the fall.

Strip cartoons must be drawn to fit in a 2" x 6 1/4" space. They may be drawn at percentage enlargements of that, for example, 150% would be 3" x 9 3/8", 200% would be 4" x 12.5".

Cartoons must be drawn in black ink; paint, felt tip markers and flair pens work best. Ballpoint pens are banned because they photocopy horribly. No. 2 pencil and blue ink do not work well either.

Cartoons will be judged both on artistic quality as well as content. Racist, sexist, homophobic and anti-Semitic material will not be printed. Cartoons may also be rejected on the grounds of poor taste, such as vulgarity.

There is great competition for space on the page. Judgement for space rests solely with the managing editor. Please submit material before the end of final examinations period, as many spaces will be assigned over the summer break.

Drop off a photocopy of your original work in the mailbox marked "Cartoon Submissions" in the Collegian newsroom, 113 Campus Center. Please include your full name, academic year, current address and phone number and a phone number you may be reached at during summer break. Our office hours are Mon-Fri, 9 a.m.-5 p.m. Any inquiries about the fall 1998 comics page may be made to Victoria Groves, 545-1809.

UMass will host first round against Big East titan, Sooners face Harvard to get to World Series

JORMA KANSANEN / COLLEGIAN

A 1997 third-team All-American, junior hurler Danielle Henderson hopes to lead her team back to the women's collegiate World Series.

They say that home is where the heart is. For the Massachusetts softball team, home is now more than just where the heart is. Home is the fifth location of the NCAA Regionals.

After winning their NCAA play-in series with Hofstra, UMass earned themselves an automatic bid into the NCAA Tournament. Sunday night the team gathered at Rafters Pub with fingers crossed, hoping the selection committee would bestow upon them the honor of hosting the first round.

The selection committee did just that, naming UMass as the regional site for tournament games between the Minutewomen, Boston College, Harvard, and Oklahoma.

"I think that it's a great opportunity for our kids to have a home site, to host at home. I am very happy for our players that we got to host at home," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said.

For the region, Oklahoma is seeded first, UMass second, B.C. third, and Harvard fourth. Play will begin this Friday, and run through the weekend, with the championship game being held on Sunday. The tournament consists of double elimination format. The winner will advance to the Women's College World Series, to be held May 24–25 in Oklahoma City.

Oklahoma should prove to be the biggest obstacle for the Minutewomen, but they have other things to worry about first. UMass will play their first game on Friday at 1 p.m. against cross–state rival B.C. (38–12–1). The Minutewomen finished off their regular season against the Eagles, sweeping them in a doubleheader. It wasn't an easy sweep by any means. The first game was won by just 1–0, and the second game went to ten innings, before UMass ended things at 2–1.

"I can't be worrying about Oklahoma right now," Sortino said. "I have to worry about Boston College. Oklahoma, and whoever else, doesn't matter right now. We have to worry about Boston College. They are a very fine team."

The Eagles may be looking for revenge against UMass. In last year's regionals, the Minutewomen knocked B.C. out of the tournament with a 4–1 win. The Eagles are the reigning Big East conference champions, which earned them an automatic bid into the tournament.

Sophomore Chris Vicari was named the Big East Tournament's Most Outstanding Performer after she hit two home runs, including a three run hit in the championship game. Rookie Jennifer Perrotta was named the Big East Rookie of the Year. She leads the Eagles with a .365 batting average. Coach Jennifer Finley also earned Big East honors, earning accolades as the Coach of the Year. She recorded her 100th victory with B.C. in a May 2 win over Rutgers.

The Eagles have been led on the mound by sophomore Mary Dietz. She allowed only nine hits in the Big East tournament, for a 0.45 ERA. She also holds the Big East single–season strikeout record with 101 in 13 appearances. UMass, however, is confident they can hit well against her.

"To me, she's very hittable, I think that we'll do well against her," senior Kim Gutridge said. "She has good movement, but it's easy to read her pitches, because she's not a quick pitcher."

Should the Minutewomen advance to meet Oklahoma, they feel their chances are good against the Sooners as well.

"I'm excited because we haven't seen them or played against them," Gutridge said. "It seems like we always play really well against teams that we don't know."

UMass, Flint steal Crooks from St. John's

Although he may have initially overlooked the University of Massachusetts after a prolific high school career, former St. John's basketball guard Shannon Crooks announced yesterday that he has signed a letter of intent to play for the Minutemen.

According to NCAA Division I transfer rules, Crooks must sit out the upcoming 1998–1999 season before retaining his eligibility.

Although the former Everett High School stand out (26.0 ppg, 9.0 rpg, 9.0 apg) must endure a one–year absence from competition, UMass coach James "Bruiser" Flint feels that the extra preparation time should allow Crooks to develop into an impact player.

"We recruited Shannon very hard when he was a senior in high school," Flint said of the former Red Storm prospect, who averaged under two points per contest during his 23 appearances last season. "We're just happy he gave us a second look. We hope he can use next year to work on his game, so he is ready to make an immediate contribution when he becomes eligible the following season."

After a disappointing 1997–1998 campaign stemming from lack of playing time under second year St. John's coach Fran Fraschilla, Crooks' jump from Big East to Atlantic 10 basketball may be the perfect tonic for his flat collegiate start. Although the Everett native played in only two thirds of the Red Storm games last season, Crooks will be awarded the opportunity to compete for a major role in the Minutemen back court.

Having played along side current UMass players Monty Mack, Mike Babul, and Jonathan DeFina as a former participant of the Boston Shootout, Crooks may already be familiar with the styles of three Minutemen who are currently key components of the team. And, with junior guard Charlton Clarke departing after next season, the 6– foot–2, 205–pound recruit may have timed his decision perfectly.

However, with the arrival of Crooks comes the departure of a scholarship, giving Flint and his staff only one additional scholarship to work with for the upcoming season.

Baseball faces Hokies in A–10 one–day makeup tournament

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

The Liberty Bell will ring again in Philadelphia (hopefully) as the Massachusetts baseball team will once again attempt to play in the Atlantic 10 tournament. This time they are going to play at Veterans Stadium, instead of the previously scheduled Bear Stadium in Boyertown, Pa. This is the first time in eleven years the tournament has not been held there.

Drenching rain storms have flooded a predominant amount of the northeastern seaboard this past week and thus held an iron fist over the tourney which was supposed to be played this past weekend.

The Minutemen are the No. 1 seed in the East and will face the No. 2 seed in the West, Virginia Tech, today at 11 p.m. At 2:30 p.m., the No. 1 seed in the West, George Washington will challenge the No. 2 seed in the East, Fordham. Instead of the normal two–game elimination, it has been reduced to a one–game elimination to allow the winner to rest for the NCAA tournament play–in on Thursday and Friday. The A–10 winner will host a not–yet determined team.

Junior Bill Cooke will represent UMass on the mound as he sports an 8–1 record and a flawless 6–0 in conference record. The lefthander is 2–0 versus Virginia Tech who has scored one run off of him in 11 innings.

The 1998 Atlantic 10 All–Conference Baseball teams were selected this week as senior Muchie Daglitere heads up the Minutemen with a slot in the top tier. The second baseman batted an impressive .445 with 1 homer, while knocking in 49 RBI. He also set a school record for most consecutive games with a hit at 31 games.

Junior centerfielder Doug Clark landed on the second–team as he hit .372. The captain has provided much of the power for the Minutemen, driving in 37 runs on eight dingers. He also hit four triples. Bill Cooke joins Clark on the second team, striking out 46 batters and going the distance seven consecutive games.

The A–10 Player of the Year is junior Matt Griswold of Virginia Tech who hit .371 and drove in 63 Hokie runs. He hit nine home runs including three grand slams. Jay Krystofolski was named Pitcher of the Year despite suffering six losses. Virginia Tech's Pat Pinkman seized the Rookie of the Year award and Tom Wiater of the Colonials was named Coach of the Year.

UM women's water polo takes eighth at NCAAs

By Paul Teves
Collegian Staff

What a season for the No. 7 Massachusetts women's water polo team. They finished strong by winning their first ever Eastern Title, and qualifying for nationals for the second straight season.

The Minutewomen also set various records along the way this season. They won 22 straight games, which is a UMass school record. They also won 30 games in a season, which is another UMass first. In addition, UMass finished higher this year at Nationals than it did one year ago.

The Minutewomen placed eighth at Nationals this year and came through with their second consecutive overtime victory. After winning the Eastern's in double overtime, Massachusetts made it exciting in their first game against Michigan University.

After jumping out to a 3–0 lead at halftime, on the strength of Andrea Vazquez's three goals, UMass gave the Wolverines room to work in the second half, allowing Michigan to tie the game by the end of regulation. UMass regained its composure and took it to Michigan in overtime, and at the 9:15 mark of sudden death double overtime, Marcie Hupp netted her third OT goal of the season to lead UMass to a 6–5 victory.

Michigan was the easy game, the road got tougher for UMass, as they faced the No. 2 Stanford. The Cardinals slowly picked apart UMass in the second round robin game, defeating them 10–2.

UMass only showed its strength in the third quarter, as they played with the west coast squad. It was in the third period when Vazquez and Katie Grogan each scored to keep hope alive, but the Cardinals were just too strong a squad.

"We played well against Stanford, there was a moment where we could have pulled it to within four and we made an error and got caught, and Stanford capitalized at the other end, which made it a six–point game," said coach Dan McOsker.

The loss to Stanford sent UMass to the round of 5–8, and not to the Final Four. This loss might have taken the wind out of a team, which under different circumstances could have beaten the University of Southern California or San Diego State. They proved they could defeat USC earlier this season.

COURTESY MEDIA RELATIONS

Senior captain Barbara Hickey

"The loss to Stanford might have affected us a little bit, but I think USC had everything going for them," said McOsker. "They were at home, they had a referee that refs all their games."

UMass had their moment of brilliance against USC, again in the third quarter when they outscored the Trojans 4–1. The problem with the come back was named Bernice Orwig. Orwig was the Trojan goalie, who made 14 saves throughout the game, only faltering in the third period. After three periods, UMass was within striking distance with the score 6–4, but Orwig shut the door similar to another Trojan victory against UMass earlier this season.

In the seventh place match, the Minutewomen played San Diego State, and struggled again to put the ball in the net. The score was 4–2 after three periods, but again the fourth quarter resulted in some problems for this young team. They gave up four goals in the fourth to lose 8–3, but this tournament will result in a learning experience for the team.

UMass will probably finish the season ranked No. 8, with a record of 30–6.

This team had a great season, with many success stories, and gives us a lot to look forward to next season.

"We had a great season, and we are looking to build off this experience for next year," said McOsker.

Sophomores, Katie Grogan, Claudia Clement, Marcie Hupp, and Lyndsay Crenshaw, will bring their explosive offense back next season. Also look for freshmen Katie Mayer, Erin Hillier, and Sarah Newell to return with even stronger seasons, now that they have had a taste of what it is like to be at Nationals. Expect also to see more from Vanessa Solis, who should see more action next season.

The Minutewomen lose senior Barbara Hickey, and her 29 goals. They also lose superstar Andrea Vazquez and her high powered offense, which translated into 82 goals this season. In net they lose the experienced Nieves, who was a huge asset in goal for UMass. Despite the loss of these seniors the team should be strong again next year and for a long time to come.

"This will be the end of our club era, and will signify a new beginning, and maybe we can take it to the next level," said McOsker.

Haitians chased by immigration

MIAMI (AP) — More than 150 Haitians jumped from a freighter into the Miami River and swam ashore yesterday, then were chased around riverfront businesses by U.S. immigration agents and police.

"We had a lot of policemen running in and out with their guns drawn," said Este Garcia, owner of Garcia's Seafood Grill. "They were in the restaurant, jumping in the water. It was a madhouse."

It was not immediately known if anyone was hurt.

Miami police said the jumpers were undocumented Haitians. At least 120 people were captured and many were ordered to sit against the wall of a warehouse near the river, which divides downtown Miami from the ritzy high-rises to the south and is frequented by small freighters from the Caribbean and the Bahamas.

Forty teen-agers were among the Haitians who jumped from the green-and-white freighter named Rose-Marie Express as it pulled into dock, police said. Some of the passengers ducked into waiting cars and escaped while others hid under the docks.

"It was insane," said Garcia's waitress Lisette Rivera. "I saw about 10 of them jump into a little Honda."

Ford recalls trucks because of lug nut

WASHINGTON (AP) — Ford Motor Co. is recalling 1.7 million vehicles including some F-series pickups, the best-selling vehicles in America, because a faulty lug nut could cause the wheels to fall off.

The automaker is voluntarily recalling F-150 pickup trucks and most F-250 pickups and the Expedition and Navigator sport utility vehicles from model years 1997 and 1998, Ford spokeswoman Karen Shaughnessy said yesterday.

Ford said there were 98 reports of wheels separating from the vehicle and four injuries were reported.

The wheel separation was caused by an anti-corrosion coating on the lug nut that did not allow for enough force on the wheel, Shaughnessy said. In some cases, the studs holding the lug nut would break or bend.

"It could potentially result in a wheel coming off the vehicle," Shaughnessy said.

The company has since changed the coating.

Government records show many complaints from vehicle owners who said a wheel fell off while they were driving, leaving an axle suspended above the pavement or dropping the axle to the ground while the wheel rolled away.

"In April (1997) while driving on the freeway, a wheel fell off my truck," said one motorist driving an F-series pickup. The government makes the complaints public after removing the motorists' names.

Biology students criticize professor's class language

Group makes complaint to Ombudsman

By Victoria Groves
Collegian Staff

Nine students of Professer John D. Palmer have met with the University Ombudsman in anger over the way he has been teaching the course Biology of Social Issues at the University of Massachusetts.

Undergraduate Patricia Piesiur organized the meeting and described Palmer's "loaded language" in his lectures as harassing.

"My problem is his language. I find it terribly harassing. Our only other option is not going and failing the class. It's a lose–lose situation," Piesiur said.

Palmer agrees that he has used phrases such as "killing babies" in lieu of "aborting a zygote" and "partial birth abortion," a term coined by the pro–life movement, instead of medical terms like dilation and extraction.

"Partial birth abortion is what everyone calls it. Killed may not be the best term to use, but you can't be too sensitive in life," Palmer said.

> "My problem is his language. I find it terribly harassing. Our only other option is not going and failing the class. It's a lose–lose situation."
> – Patricia Piesiur

Undergraduate Michele Morris agreed with Piesiur that portions of Palmer's lectures were offensive in specific reference to the "morning–after pill" as a form of abortion.

"I was really concerned that he had mentioned the morning–after pill and referred to it as an abortive device," Morris said.

Miami police said the jumpers were undocumented Haitians. At least 120 people were captured and many were ordered to sit against the wall of a warehouse near the river, which divides downtown Miami from the ritzy high-rises to the south and is frequented by small freighters from the Caribbean and the Bahamas.

Forty teen-agers were among the Haitians who jumped from the green-and-white freighter named Rose-Marie Express as it pulled into dock, police said. Some of the passengers ducked into waiting cars and escaped while others hid under the docks.

"It was insane," said Garcia's waitress Lisette Rivera. "I saw about 10 of them jump into a little Honda."

The recent meeting with the Ombudsmen marked the most students ever to approach that office concerning an individual professor.

Palmer claims that there haven't been complaints about the way he has taught the course in the past.

"No one's ever complained before," Palmer said.

Many students have walked out of the class while Palmer was lecturing, including a female student who was angry with his terminology.

"I don't think they understand. They're a strange crowd and they have a chip on their shoulders," Palmer said.

When she voiced her concern the class turned on her and she walked out.

"It must have been really embarrassing for that poor little girl when they told her to get out," Palmer said.

Piesiur and Morris saw this occurrence as other students believing Palmer's lecture without biological evidence to back it up. There is no textbook for the course.

"It's hard to believe how many people believe what they're fed. It's nothing that would be supported in a biology book," Piesiur said.

Piesiur and Morris were also concerned with Palmer's inclusion of religion in the abortion section of the course. They felt that he only spoke of those religions that were pro–life.

"He did not mention any religions that support choice," Morris said.

His lecture included discussions of Catholicism, Protestantism and Islam.

Palmer is retiring at the end of the semester so the complaining students are not expecting him to be reprimanded. Instead they want the class to be structured in a less biased way.

"Everybody is really angry at this professor. He generally just shows a lot of insensitivity. We would like stricter guidelines for those teaching it to stick to scientific terms. If he were staying I think we would be dealing with this differently. Our concern is the likelihood that this could happen again," Morris said.

Piesiur agreed.

"My goal is to make sure the administration won't let this happen again. This class has great potential," Piesiur said.

Piesiur insists she is not scrutinizing Palmer for his pro-life views, simply for not allowing students to have other opinions.

"I'm not scrutinizing him for portraying anti–abortion views, but for portraying them as biological fact. He almost gets off on causing controversy in the classroom," Piesiur said.

Palmer insists that he is teaching the course strictly based on biological research.

"I don't take sides at all. It's biology. It's not my opinion," Palmer said.

Peeper sought by UM police

University of Massachusetts police are investigating a report of an alleged assault which happened in a University residence hall in the early morning hours of Sunday, May 10.

At approximately 5:30 a.m., a male perpetrator allegedly entered a female resident's unlocked room in Central Residence Area hall and assaulted the resident. The suspect fled from the scene when the victim screamed, according to a public safety alert which was released yesterday.

According to the alert, the alleged suspect is described by the victim as a "Caucasian male, approximately 6 feet, skinny in build, 18–20 years of age, with short brown hair and a long face."

The victim also said at the time of the alleged assault the perpetrator was wearing tan khaki baggy pants, a white t–shirt and high–top white sneakers.

Anyone who may have observed an individual fitting the above description in the Central Residential Area late Saturday night or early Sunday morning should contact the UMass Police's Community Disorders Unit at 545–0893 or contact the UMass TIPS line at 577–8477.

Justice Dept. tries to stop TV merger

By Jeannine Aversa
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — Citing concerns about a "cable monopoly," the Justice Department sued to block the merger of two direct broadcast satellite companies — one owned by big cable companies, the other by Rupert Murdoch.

A merger between Primestar Inc. and Murdoch's satellite business would blunt competition, and thus the prospect of lower prices, in an industry that has "constantly increasing prices," said the nation's top antitrust regulator, Assistant Attorney General Joel I. Klein.

The $1.1 billion deal would have given the nation's five largest cable TV companies, which together own Primestar, a major share of the emerging business that beams TV programs from satellites directly to pizza-sized dishes in people's homes.

Importantly, the deal also would have given Primestar the last of only three national licenses to provide direct broadcast satellite, or DBS, service in the United States.

The DBS business poses the greatest direct threat yet to cable television because it can provide a multitude of channels and crystal-clear picture and sound quality.

The five cable companies that control Primestar "have no economic incentive to use this valuable DBS satellite capacity to steal their own cable subscribers and thus cannot be expected to do so," said the Justice Department's civil suit, filed yesterday in U.S. District Court here.

"Rather their strategy is to keep this scarce asset out of the hands of any firm that would compete vigorously against their cable operations."

The deal was opposed by consumer groups led by Consumers Union and by rival DBS companies, DirecTV and EchoStar Communications.

"As most Americans know, cable is one of the most powerful and durable monopolies in this country," Klein said in announcing the suit. "We have a choice, usually, of one cable company and as a result we are seeing constantly increasing prices that have to be paid in our monthly bills."

Together, the five cable companies that back Primestar serve 60 percent of the nation's 67 million cable TV customers, the Justice Department said. In contrast, DirecTV and EchoStar collectively have just more than 5 million customers — most of them former cable TV subscribers.

Cable TV prices rose 7.9 percent in the accounting year ending March 31, according to the government's

Bias exists in Viagra–contraception debate, group says

By John Hendren
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) — A doctors' group is accusing insurance companies of sex discrimination for covering the impotence pill Viagra but not birth control for women.

The American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists urged Congress yesterday to pass a bill requiring insurers that pay for prescription drugs to cover contraception as well.

Dr. Anita Nelson, a spokeswoman for the doctors' group meeting this week in New Orleans, said contraception is a "medical necessity."

Insurance companies are demonstrating "a clear bias," said Nelson, an obstetrician and gynecologist at the University of California at Los Angeles.

"Viagra just hit like a tsunami and had immediate acceptance. I'm glad there's coverage for male impotence, but it does contrast with the lack of coverage for contraception."

Insurers say that birth-control coverage is available but that many employers decide not to offer such benefits because of the cost.

While nine out of 10 employer-based health insurance plans cover prescription drugs, most don't cover prescription contraceptives, the doctors' group said. Employer-based plans cover two-thirds of all women ages 14 to 44.

By contrast, nearly half of the almost 300,000 men per week who take Viagra — the latest and most popular impotence drug — are reimbursed at least in part by their insurers, according to IMS Health, a consulting group. Up to 75 percent of patients using rival impotence treatments are reimbursed.

"It's absolutely discriminatory not to offer it," said Maidi Terry, a 27-year-old graduate student in Tempe, Ariz., whose insurer does not reimburse her for her birth control pills. "Viagra's a good example. These options should be available to both men and women."

Viagra costs about $10 per pill. Birth control pills, the most common contraceptive, typically cost $20 to $30 a month.

The call for contraceptive coverage drew outrage from the anti-abortion American Life League, which opposes birth control drugs and believes women who want to avoid pregnancy should abstain from sex during the days when they are fertile.

"Pregnancy is not a disease," said Judie Brown, the organization's president. She added, "The decision to use most recent figures. Inflation overall was just 1.4 percent during the same period. The average monthly cable rate, including a remote control and converter, was $28.83 as of last July 1, according to the Federal Communications Commission.

The Justice Department's lawsuit would block Primestar from acquiring the DBS assets of Murdoch's News Corp. Ltd. and MCI. The government alleged the deal would constitute an illegal monopolization and an unlawful restraint of trade.

The government said the deal would allow the cable companies that own Primestar — Tele-Communications Inc., Time Warner Inc., Comcast Corp., Cox Enterprises Inc. and US West/MediaOne — to protect their monopolies and keep out new competitors using the satellite technology. TCI and Time Warner are the nation's largest and second-largest cable companies.

"This is an important moment for the future of television," said Andrew Schwartzman, president of the public interest law firm Media Access Project, which had urged Justice to block the deal. "If cable — through the Primestar deal — could have taken a big chunk of the DBS market away from independent companies... they may not have made it," Schwartzman said.

artificial birth control is elective."

The debate centers on a bill sponsored by Sen. Olympia Snowe (R-Maine) and Rep. James Greenwood (R-Pa.) that would require insurers that offer prescription drug benefits to cover all contraceptive drugs and devices approved by the Food and Drug Administration.

Similar bills have been offered in 20 states. A Maryland law that takes effect in October mandates coverage for contraceptive benefits by insurers that reimburse for purchases of prescription drugs. Hawaii, Montana, New Mexico, Texas, Virginia and West Virginia also have laws or regulations requiring some coverage, according to the doctors' group.

Most insurers offer plans that cover contraception, but employers often choose not to pay for such coverage, said Health Insurance Association of America spokesman Richard Coorsh. The industry group opposes requiring contraceptive coverage or mandating benefits in general because such practices drive up insurance costs, he said.

"Any benefit decision is an employer decision, or purchaser decision, and to suggest that it's an insurer decision is really off the mark," Coorsh said.

Elizabeth Cavendish, legal director of the National Abortion and Reproductive Rights Action League, said that's no reason not to mandate coverage. "There's plenty of blame to go around," she said.

Nine out of 10 health maintenance organizations offer some birth control coverage for women, said Don White, a spokeswoman for the American Association of Health Plans, an HMO trade group.

India's nuclear tests prompt Pakistan's vow to follow

By Neelesh Misra
Associated Press

NEW DELHI, India — Defying world condemnation, Indians swelled with national pride today after learning that their government conducted three underground nuclear tests. Rival Pakistan vowed to conduct its own nuclear test.

Abroad, the move was widely criticized. China said the tests created a new instability in South Asia; President Clinton recalled the U.S. ambassador and promised to impose economic sanctions against India as required by U.S. laws designed to combat nuclear proliferation.

"I call on India to announce that it will conduct no further tests and (that) it will sign the comprehensive test ban treaty now and without conditions," Clinton said today in Washington. "I also urge India's neighbors not to follow suit, not to follow down the path of a dangerous arms race."

While Indians celebrated in the streets of New Delhi with firecrackers, Pakistani Foreign Minister Gohar Ayub blamed their government for igniting nationalist passions and fueling the military rivalry between the two neighbors.

"We in Pakistan will maintain a balance with India in all fields," he declared in Islamabad today. "We are in a headlong arms race on the subcontinent."

Abdul Qadeer Khan, the architect of Pakistan's nuclear program, said Islamabad was ready to explode a device of its own whenever the government decides.

Pakistan and India have fought three wars since the Asian subcontinent gained independence in 1947.

At grocery stores, on trains and buses, in parks and on the streets, excited Indians huddled around morning newspapers today to read about Monday's underground nuclear tests in the Thar desert, 330 miles southwest of New Delhi, the capital.

"Nothing better could have happened," said the former head of the Indian air force, Air Chief Marshal N.C. Suri.

In Pokaran, near the site of the nuclear tests, townsfolk celebrated with gusto today after being surprised and frightened when the tests rocked the ground Monday. Hundreds of villagers had poured out of their houses, fearing an earthquake.

"We are happy that we can now defeat Pakistan," said 13-year-old Anek Kanwar Rathor.

Even Tushar Gandhi, grandson of nonviolent independence campaigner Mahatma Gandhi, applauded. "As an Indian I am proud it was done in India and by Indians," he said.

In Beijing, Foreign Ministry spokesman Zhu Bangzao said China was "seriously concerned" about the tests done by its neighbor. The two countries fought a brief war in 1992 over a border dispute. China set off its last nuclear test blast July 29, 1996, and declared a moratorium on testing.

Elsewhere, news of the nuclear tests provoked sharp reaction. Russian President Boris Yeltsin said India "let us down" by staging the tests. Russia has had close ties with India for decades, and has been one of India's leading arms suppliers. "India has let us down with its explosion."

Yeltsin was quoted as saying by Russian news agencies. " (But) I think that by working in a diplomatic way, and by visits, we must secure a turnaround."

Japanese officials called for a suspension of foreign economic aid. Since 1992, Japan has given $1 billion annually in aid to India, mostly in loans.

Australia and New Zealand recalled their ambassadors from New Delhi.

Itcho Ito, the mayor of Nagasaki, where 70,000 people died in the U.S. atomic bombing in 1945, flew to Tokyo to lodge a protest at the Indian Embassy.

Greenpeace International, an environmental group, said India has "made a costly mistake if it believes that domestic support of these tests are worth the increase in insecurity in the region and globally."

Brajesh Mishra, an aide to Prime Minister Atal Bihari Vajpayee, said the tests proved India is capable of building a nuclear weapon. But it was not clear whether the next step would be producing a bomb.

The federal Cabinet met in New Delhi today and reaffirmed that the government wants to discuss global disarmament.

"India remains committed to a speedy process of nuclear disarmament leading to total and global elimination of nuclear weapons," said a resolution adopted the Cabinet.

India has refused to sign international treaties banning the testing or further production of nuclear weapons, saying the treaties only froze the advantage held by the world's declared nuclear powers — Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States.

Apology

O

The UMass experience

I lived it up here at ZooMass and now it's all going to be over.

Don't kid yourselves, college is much more than academics, and anyone who tells you differently either never lived through the college experience themselves or are trying to deprive you of that experience.

My "academic" career had an auspicious beginning.

Jason Eiseman
Class of 1998

My first roommate was a 21-year-old junior. He lived it up, and when I came to school here I knew there was a side of college they don't show you in the brochures. But when I met my roommate he showed me what college was all about. He taught me to have fun and not care what other people think. He taught me not to take myself too seriously, to enjoy the social aspects of UMass.

There was the night my roommate roamed up and down the halls naked except for a pair of socks. "Because it was kind of cold" he said, when I asked him why he would even bother wearing the socks. I'd never seen everybody who lived on my floor, but when my roommate was streaking through the halls, everyone was there.

He taught me to get out there and have fun, and that's where I learned how to enjoy ZooMass.

I've been involved in some of the more famous, or infamous stories on this campus, and thank god my name was never attached to some of the disastrous events I've been a part of.

I was an eyewitness to some of the memorable snowball fights in Southwest. One of my roommates lived in an off- campus house which burned down a few years ago. My housing assignment was lost in that big fiasco at the Housing Office two years ago, and some students were housed in the Campus Center Hotel for a short time. There was the CVS scandal, but I won't say anymore about that. There are more scandals yet to come, more misadventures, for UMass and for me.

But I can sit back and say I loved it all. Even though there were some tough times I loved it all.

I don't want to be a sap. I have to say I will miss this place. I never took the experience for granted, and loved it all. Maybe I'm being over dramatic, but there were times when things looked bleak. When I was struggling through classes and struggling through other dubious events in my career.

But don't worry about your friend and humble narrator, things have a funny way of working out in the end. I'm graduating, and on time too.

Even if you don't graduate in four years, the important thing is to leave here with a degree in your hand. Don't let your friends or parents tell you how to go through college. If you want to get the most out of it, you have to make decisions for yourself.

At orientation I saw an advisor who told me I should take a math class. I knew that I never wanted to take math again, and having passed the little math test I never had to. That was the last advisor I talked to. I didn't want someone telling me what classes to take. I found out what I had to take as requirements, and other than that I took whatever classes I felt like taking, whatever interested me.

I'm leaving with a degree in journalism. I chose journalism because I love to write, but I'm not exactly sure what I want to do. But I know I want to write, and there are many ways to make money as a writer.

Of course I am worried about the future. It's a natural feeling I'm sure many seniors are having right now. People feel afraid when a situation they've become accustomed to changes.

There are people who come into school knowing what they want to major in, or leave with a career lined up. I envy those people.

"Become a dentist and write in your spare time," my uncle said to me. It was like his version of "Plastics, young man, plastics" from "The Graduate." That's me, The Graduate.

In a few weeks, it'll be like being born again. There will be no more school to come back to in the fall. There will just be my future, as wide open as it ever was.

Sorry, I've been getting off on a few tangents. I'll come back.

I won't lie. I'm scared. But life is just a journey, and this was all just another part of the journey. Soon I'll begin another part of that journey. I don't know where I'll be or what I'll do, but I'll still live it up the best I can.

UMass will go on without me, and I certainly will go on without UMass.

So what's the point of this mind drain you're reading today? These are just my final thoughts. My magnum opus, if you will.

There is a lot more I could say. There is a lot more that I want to say. I wish I could write a hundred more columns, and every week I would get something off my chest. I would air out some grievances, bad mouth someone who did me wrong.

But I can't write anymore, I've run out of space and time.

Thoughts and observations

UMass just can't seem to shake this in-state stigma, but for a guy coming from Queens, N.Y., where the largest college would fit on the soccer fields down by the Mullins Center, the opportunities and the environment offered by UMass seemed like an alluring dream. The initial thrill sparked by this environment never really faded from me; the excitement over the opportunities offered by this University got me through some difficult times.

Bryan Schwartzman
Class of 1998

The intangible feeling that something was possible at UMass kept from me transferring, even when my better judgement told me I should retreat and try some place else.

The first thing I learned about being away from home is that things don't go as planned. As a freshman I was cut from the men's tennis team, and this exclusion from the sport I loved left me confused and in desperate need of some confidence.

If that wasn't enough to discourage someone that was away from home for the first time, I have some roommate stories that would make you shudder. I'm not talking about someone talking on the phone too much; I'm talking about police, stolen goods and swastikas. Seeing a swastika painted on my bedroom was the first time in my life where my religion became an issue. It was if all the hatred and prejudice in the world hit me like a swirling river. Yet something told me these instances did not reflect UMass accurately, something told me if I left I would be missing experiences and people which would have an indescribably positive impact on me.

This instance heightened my awareness towards issues of hate and prejudice, and I challenged myself to learn about other cultures as well as my own background. That unfortunate incident led to some unexpected results: my accepting the position of Jewish Affairs Editor and my involvement with the organized Jewish community on campus. What I found was that the traditions in Judaism were not all that different from the secular tradition I embrace: they both challenge the individual to question reality and ultimately act according to conscience.

I can say without hesitation that the past four years have been the happiest of my life. I have met some incredible people, taken some outstanding courses and I have found an academic and creative purpose. My purpose is to represent myself along with the people and the world around me in words, and it is constant search to find the strongest language possible.

Other columnists have written about their freshmen year shyness, but I have no doubt that I had most of them beaten by a city mile. I had an interest in contributing to the Collegian and a belief in my writing, but I was too intimidated to assert myself. A lot has changed in the past four years, and the newspaper has a lot to do with that. Five days a week I saw a devoted staff meet deadlines, overcome obstacles and even make mistakes right before my eyes.

Producing the Collegian was a collective experience of people who were simultaneously trying to better themselves and trying to put out a publication which would be beneficial to the community. I am grateful to have been part of a team where one of the aims was to serve as a voice for the student body. Yet, without the vitality and activities of our diverse student body there would be nothing to print in the newspaper.

Just because I speak in praise of UMass and its student newspaper doesn't mean I don't think there is room for improvement. I believe each class of students needs to fight like a concrete boxer in order to eradicate continued problems of cultural ignorance, building deterioration and classroom inaccessibility.

As someone who covered a campus minority community I am distressed by the notion that various communities must compete for funding of cultural and educational programs. This is partly because there isn't any funding for these programs, and partly because various groups do not cooperate enough. Instead of arguing about which people has been most historically oppressed the ALANA, Jewish, and GLBT communities should collaborate on cultural programs and fund allocation. A combined effort on the part of these communities would give each community more power of the allocation of funds, and would serve as a tremendous example of cooperation and respect to the entire campus community.

One last thing: my UMass story is pertinent to the student body for three reasons and three reasons only: it is our right to find happiness in this world; it is our right to discover a purpose for ourselves; and it is our responsibility to claim these rights to try and make a small difference.

Eight seconds of fame

So this is it, Sayanora, adieu, adios, aufwiedersehen, ciao — however you want to put it, this is good-bye. And since I lack the requisite talent necessary for launching into a rendition of "So Long, Farewell" from the Sound of Music, I have to instead pen my good-byes.

Most of the times, when I sit down to write this column, I try to focus on the lighter side of life, mostly because I can't take myself that seriously and life is too short to worry about things like global warming or nuclear weapon testing. Well, I take that back; those are important things. But basically, I tried to poke fun at the everyday things in an effort not to piss anyone off.

Seema Gangatirkar
Class of 1998

I did piss people off every now and then and some of you were kind enough to let me know how you truly felt about my writing, via e-mail, letters to the editor or even by my voice mail. But that's okay; I forgive you all.

Getting feedback is the first step out of obscurity and I remember the first thrill, way back freshman year, when someone asked me, "Hey, aren't you the one who writes for the Collegian?"

For a while there, I basked in my semi-famous state, pleased as punch that somehow, out of 25,000 people at UMass, I had managed to avoid being a number.

And to be honest, there was a time when I would have really wanted everyone to know my name and my face. But as the years passed and I became more involved down here, I found the "Hey, aren't you the one who writes for the Collegian?" to be almost intrusive.

I never knew what to do with strangers who would knock on my door and say, "Hey, I want to get a story in..." or "Why did the Collegian do this?" Suddenly, I found myself evolving into a neurotic hermit, living under the hardly secretive pseudonym, "Arts Girl."

And now that my career here is over, I can look at the idea of fame, however fleeting or illusionary, more maturely, and know that fame is not for me — a far cry from earlier fantasies.

When I was younger, I wanted to grown up and be a rock singer. Unfortunately, as previously stated, my singing talent is on par with Milli Vanilli. And while I could lip-sync pretty well, I have two left feet, hence, I could not hope to be the next Madonna.

I also went through a phase when I would have killed to be a guest star on the "Facts of Life" and then there was a really strange period when I thought that if I practiced the Vulcan salute long enough, I could actually masquerade as an alien on "Star Trek."

Of course all these daydreams would lead to bigger and better things and soon I would be famous and achieve my real life goal of meeting Tom Cruise.

Well, with less than two weeks to graduation, my only claim to fame is writing for the Collegian and despite all the wonderful opportunities I've had here, unfortunately meeting Tom Cruise doesn't seem to be in my future.

What is in my future is an appointment with the Real World. Granted, after living in the cocoon that is UMass, I haven't a clue as to what I'm going to do once I get out into the Real World, but I've heard rumors about phone bills, health insurance and full-time jobs.

So, allow me to indulge myself in my last few moments of fame. You see, I've had this daydream for a while, about winning at the Oscars (during my phase when I thought I was going to be the next Jodie Foster) and being able to publicly thank anyone who might have ever had an effect on my life. Since I wear my emotions on my sleeve and can't tell a convincing lie to save my soul, I'm going to have to discard that fantasy and rather rely on this column for my thanks.

First up, a big thank you goes to my colleagues at the Collegian. I appreciate how you stepped in for me when I needed you. It's been an honor and pleasure to work with you all.

To all my friends — you guys have been the absolute greatest. Thank you for helping me through a difficult year and for making sure I got out of bed everyday. I would not have made it without you.

And most of all, to those of you who read my column every Wednesday for the past two years. I appreciated your kind comments and I hope I made you smile or chuckle at least once in a while. I wish you all the very best.

And keep your fingers crossed for me: if I make all the right moves, I just might get to meet Tom Cruise.

Applause for Hillary Clinton

To the editor:

Again the First Lady of the United States has demonstrated far more independence and courage than her husband.

Hillary Rodham Clinton recently stated, via satellite to a group of Israeli and Palestinian youth in Geneva for a conference on the prospects for Mideast peace, that she felt it would be in the long-term interests of peace and stability in the region for the Palestinians to have their own state.

She went on when answering questions to add that the long suffering Palestinians will have the governmental responsibilities of providing for its people, with such things as health care, education and the development of industry and commerce.

No sooner did those words leave her mouth, than the president's spokesman and entire Clinton Administration disavowed her comments saying they were her own "personal" feelings and did not reflect official U.S. policy on this question.

All Mrs. Clinton did was to state the obvious and that peace negotiations and talks are not an end in themselves. She knows what the end game is and she came right out and said it. "The Palestinians need a state of their own."

The criticism and heat she has received for having "the nerve" to come right out with the heart of this whole matter has not subsided from the Israelis and their American patrons.

Three cheers for Hillary Clinton for showing at least someone in Washington has the guts to speak the truth!

GEO agency fee necessary

To the editor:

Sean Werle's letter to the editor (Collegian 5/7), shows a deep misunderstanding of why the Graduate Employee Organizations (GEO) exists in the first place. His "how many dollars I make versus how many dollars I give GEO" reasoning is much too short-sighted to address the question of GEO's importance, including to grad employees from the higher paid departments. Every grad employee benefits from coming together to collectively bargain with the administration over our employment conditions and other University issues.

Take Werle's hypothetical student A, who has a stipend of $2,400, has two children, and would rather advocate on her own behalf. Werle seems to believe that she "receives no benefit from GEO advocacy that she couldn't have demanded on the strength of her own merit." This is simply not true. Her stipend, although impressive, is still not very much to raise two kids on. It may not be enough to buy her own family health insurance and find private child care for her children.

Werle believes that grad employees from the higher paid departments should contribute to GEO, just not as much as we currently do. His concern is that the agency fee is not uniform, though each grad employee contributes the same, approximately two percent of her or his weekly earnings. Note that the phrase "pay your share" implies that each person has a distinct share (in dollar amounts) based on her or his earnings. Most grad employees from the higher paid departments understand that paying our share is necessary to ensure that the contract is administered properly, and have been paying GEO dues voluntarily all along.

Tori Amos brings forth a more cohesive set of songs on From the Choirgirl Hotel.

Amos makes smooth transition; Hayden gets Closer to success

FROM THE CHOIRGIRL HOTEL
Tori Amos
Atlantic

Never one to play her ace of spades, the mercurial Tori Amos lets down her guard more than usual on From the Choirgirl Hotel, but still manages to shroud her moving, eccentric lyrics in a haze of abstract imagery. Not that there's anything wrong with that.

In many respects, this is Amos's most coherent work yet, certainly more than the all-over-the-map Boys For Pele, an album I still don't fully comprehend two years after its release. That's always been her strength though, the innate ability to elicit such an emotional reaction from her audience while still remaining largely a mystery at the same time.

As she showcased on her Sneak Preview tour last month, Amos has gone a new direction artistically on the new album, bringing in a backing band of rock musicians to compliment her almost virtuoso piano-playing. The results on From The Choirgirl Hotel are mixed, but Amos has never made a truly complete album in her career. She's just too damn abstruse sometimes, which, unfortunately, means about half her songs are thoroughly tuneless.

When she's on, though, there is no denying her power. "Jackie's Strength" is a classic Amos song, only this time with an easily discernable subject matter, and a poignant one at that — her wedding day. Elsewhere, she chronicles other major lifestyle changes she's recently gone through, including her miscarriage on "Cruel" and an oblique Kurt Cobain reference on "She's Your Cocaine" in which she mentions the Exodus Treatment Center where Cobain escaped before he committed suicide.

Her voice is once again in fine form, alternating between harpy shrieks to Broadway show-tune banter and Amos keeps the reins firmly in her hands, or vocal cords rather. For those already indoctrinated, From the Choirgirl Hotel won't disappoint. On the other hand, it probably won't take Amos to superduperstar status either. B

Trax On Trax Off

It's hard enough coming up with fresh material for a band that's only been around a couple years, just ask Dave Matthews. For Sonic Youth and Bad Religion — groups that have passed through the post-Nirvana alterna-explosion with their dignity still intact — both groups show on their latest albums that you don't have to grow old gracefully. In fact, both seem to prefer to kick and scream, although each take a decidedly different approach.

For the seminal New York art-rock outfit Sonic Youth, A Thousand Leaves marks a headlong return to the challenging music that characterized their prodigious mid-eighties period of experimentalism. Songs like "French Tickler" and "Female Mechanic Now On Duty" signal the return to the most dissonant of pop. It's not quite a regression, but rather a move forward while looking back. Considering their propensity for mis-tuned guitars and the like, everything sounds fresh and new — not an easy task for a band on their 14th studio album. Maybe that's why, after all these years, Sonic Youth still matter.

On the other hand, Southern California's Bad Religion are up to their old tricks, playing punk rock hard, fast, lean, mean and honest. What's always set them above their peers are the highbrow lyrics of Greg Graffin and the pointed barbs that go along with them.

On No Substance, the music is much the same, but Graffin's lyrics cast a glaring look at surface perceptions on "All Fantastic Images" and "Sowing the Seeds of Utopia."

The Double Edge Theatre will perform Keter later on this month.

Theatre group deals with culture

By Bryan Schwartzman
Collegian Staff

Double Edge Theatre, an ensemble based in Ashfield, will once again be performing Keter, the Crowning Song. Keter is the third part of a trilogy the group has developed over the past 12 years dealing with Jewish culture and history in the diaspora which draws references from music, literature, legends, prayers and various communities throughout Eastern Europe.

The group has developed a unique approach to theater, combining anthropological research with a more personal kind of performance. Artistic director Stacy Klein created the group with ensemble members 15 years ago in an attempt to push theater to its limits and analyze the loss of culture in the 20th century.

"Through theater we talk about the culture we have created," Klein said.

In 1994 the Boston-based group relocated to their current space just off Route 116, a 100-acre barn which functions as living and performance space for the group. The group's actors are responsible for all aspects of the creative process from research to developing training techniques and set design.

Klein said members of the group travel throughout the world and participate in non-academic research by inter- acting with various culture. Keter often deals with Jewish and non-Jewish cultures in the Ukrainian mountains which have been nearly driven out of exile by Nazi and communist regimes. The group believes the best way to connect with a culture is through that culture's music.

"The life of the work is continually renewed through this type of dialogue, and through a constant juxtaposition of realities and circumstances, such as the battle in Double Edge's performance work between tradition and contemporary life waged theatrically," Klein said.

The group's Master Actor Nachum Cohen said that song is about breathing, and one of the goals of the group is to bring creativity into every aspect of their lives.

Cohen, who was born in Syria and raised in Israel said, "As long as I am alive I don't think I can rest upon what I've done."

Cohen said the name Double Edge reflects that everything has two sides, and there is a duality to existence.

"It's about balancing on an edge without falling over," Cohen said.

Keter was completed last year and originally performed in September. Double Edge Theatre's performance space is approximately a half hour north of Amherst on Route 116. Keter will be performed May 15 &16 and 22 &23 at 8 p.m. For more information call 413-628-0277.

Showtime will broadcast Lolita despite controversy over movie

By David Bauder
Associated Press

NEW YORK — After film distributors balked at releasing the new movie version of Lolita in the United States because it depicts pedophilia, Showtime said last week that it had bought the rights and will show it on cable TV in August.

The filmed adaptation of Vladimir Nabokov's novel stars actor Jeremy Irons as Humbert Humbert, a 45-year-old professor involved in a romance with his 12-year-old stepdaughter.

Director Adrian Lyne had accused U.S. distributors of being too scared to take on controversial material; some distributors simply said the movie is dull. Lolita was released in Europe last summer.

"I'm just thrilled it's being shown," Lyne said. "I think it's a courageous decision on Showtime's part. Certainly Hollywood hasn't shown a great deal of courage."

Lolita will ? so be shown on the Sundance Channel, which Showtime partly owns.

In deference to the subject matter, Showtime executive Jerry Offsay said it will be aired late at night and not be preceded by a movie that appeals to children.

Showtime would not disclose a purchase price but said it was below the $58 million it cost to make the film.

Showtime, with 10 million paid subscribers in the U.S., has aired controversial material before. It premiered Anjelica Huston's film, Bastard Out of Carolina in 1996 after Turner Broadcasting System head Ted Turner rejected it because of a rape scene.

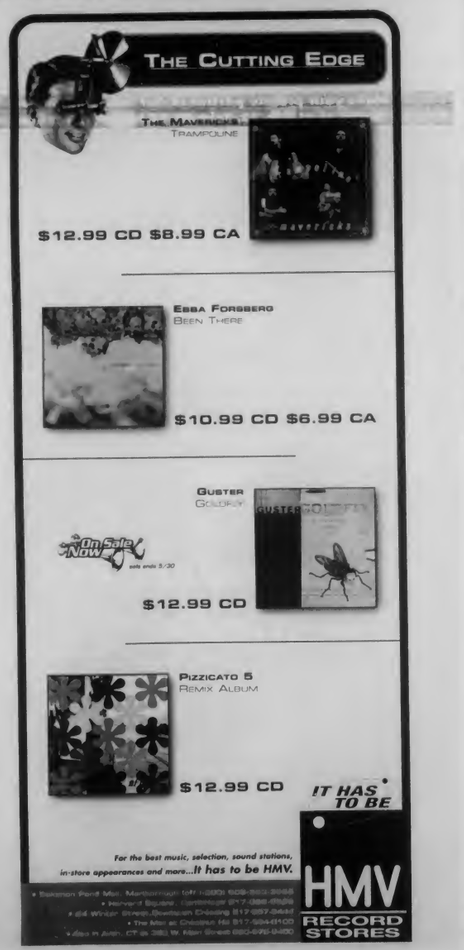
"Because we have no advertisers and because we are invited into people's homes as a subscription service, we have some freedom to do things that other people can't or won't do," Offsay said.

He noted that the original film version of the novel, directed by Stanley Kubrick and released in 1962, is shown frequently on television. Lyne's remake received an "R" rating.

The new version contains graphic kissing and two brief scenes of the clothed couple engaged in lovemaking.

It also contains one brief nude scene with a stand-in for Dominique Swain, the California actress who was 15-years-old when she depicted Lolita.

A 1996 federal law against child pornography makes it a crime to produce any visual depiction that "is, or appears to be, of a minor engaged in sexually explicit conduct."



Hearing a challenge to the law two months ago, a federal appeals court in California quizzed lawyers on whether the law would ban any version of Lolita no matter how old the actress.

"This is a classic book that has already had one film produced for it," Offsay said. "With the precautions that the filmmakers took, we believe that they have complied with all applicable laws."

Showtime is negotiating for a U.S. theatrical release after Lolita appears on television and said four or five distributors are now interested.

Lyne said he's disappointed the movie won't be seen in theaters first, but that publicity about child abuse cases hurt his distribution efforts.

"I really do think it's the last taboo," he said.

There's also "The Voracious March of Godliness" which examines the ignored lessons of history as they apply to exploitation of the planet and the struggles for power and control. VERSION 2.0
Garbage
Almo Sounds

They spent a year in the studio for this? No one said following up Garbage's self-title debut would be easy, but Version 2.0 ranks as the year's biggest let-down thus far.

All the studio trickery and trademark "big sound" of a Butch Vig-produced effort are here, but it all sounds passé this time around. The fact that Vig produced it may have something to do with the album sounding so mechanical and, well, cold. Shirley Manson's vocals are merely adequate and songs like "I Think I'm Paranoid" and "Special" show why. Unlike Beth Gibbons of Portishead, who uses her voice as a malleable tool, Manson is content to deliver abominable lyrics like "You can look but you can't touch... I don't think I like you so much."

Version 2.0 suffers from system error. Let's hope they can correct the problems for version 3.0. C– (M.K.)

THE CLOSER I GET Hayden
Outpost

Some of us fall in love everyday. Passing glances, hidden smiles and, if we're lucky, a bit of conversation holds opportunity. When that moment passes, and we are still alone, there is only one thing we are left with: that indescribable "what if?"

Hayden Dresser is the new king of teenage poets. The moment after these subtle moments of connection fuel God- knows how many poems by love struck young 'uns, and Hayden does a beautiful job of capturing them. The best thing to come out of Canada since Ron Hextall, Hayden writes songs about the little things in life, but is most effective when writing about heartbreak. Missed opportunities are frequent in his world. The protagonist in "The Hazard of Sitting Beneath Palm Trees," is waiting for a girl's glance to reach him as it sweeps a beach, when she is approached by one of the men with "one track minds." In "Two Doors," the narrator is left alone is his hotel room, thinking of what to say to the girl in the next room, who is watching the same thing on TV as he is.

Hayden appeals to the teenage poet in all of us. The giddy romanticism of "Between Us To Hold" (where he sings about teaching his girlfriend to play guitar, pressing her fingers against the strings) more than make up for songs like "In Memphis" (please, no more songs about the "tragic" figure of Elvis!).

Hayden puts into words what most of us feel, and he does so with a beautiful eye for detail and a wonderful feel for emotion. B+ (Mike Messaros)

Lenny Kravitz
Virgin

In any Lenny Kravitz recording, one thing is a constant — style. Everything the man does relies upon the amalgamation of any number of musical influences to create a resulting product unique to him alone. His latest stands at the pinnacle of style achievement, dipping into funk, rock, r&b and hip hop.

Several of the tracks on this CD don't just sound like '70s funk, they are '70s funk. Most of the album holds an over- the-top outrageousness characteristic of '70s r&b, funk, and soul, lovingly made in the Kravitz way.

It all begins with the hard funk reminiscent of Sly Stone on "Live," a song made of layer upon layer of grooves, uncharacteristic of anything on either of Kravitz' previous two efforts. Moving further down the funkdafied history line, the effects-oriented "Super Soul Fighter" could have been recorded by P-Funk, and the almost wholly- instrumental "Straight Colt Player" is like something off the Shaft soundtrack.

Kravitz stays groovy but also gets sentimental and really starts to flow on "Thinking of You," a song for his mother which features a heavy dose of drums juxtaposed on some soulful lyrics. He furthers the trend on "Little Girl's Eyes," sensitively referring to his daughter.

The only track that doesn't seem to fit with Kravitz' style collage is "Black Velveteen," a techno lament about technology and the possibility of a virtual lover — but the sound is still cool.

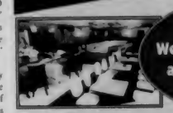
Lenny puts it all together on this one, his distinctive vocals meshing nicely with layers of sound textures, but the CD is a bit long — a couple of the later tracks seem redundant. B+ (Joe Sullivan)

BEN HARPER LIVE
Ben Harper
Virgin

Ben Harper has been described as one of the up and coming luminaries in the musical movement known as neo- folk, but in reality, his musical style is far more varied. Neo-folk, neo-funk, neo-whatever, his music speaks to people, and people listen.

Last summer he released his third album The Will To Live to critical praise, earning a minor radio-hit with "Faded," and winning himself a spot on this summer's H.O.R.D.E. tour. In recent months, the album has been re-released with a bonus five-song EP, Ben Harper Live.

Recorded during Harper's 1997 world tour, the CD contains live versions of "The Will To Live," "Faded," and "I Shall Not Walk Alone" from the last release, as well as "Forever," off Harper's first release Welcome To The Cruel World, and a cover of Jimi Hendrix' "Voodoo Chile."



"Voodoo Chile," filled with intense vocals and crazy feedback from Harper's slide guitar is all right, but the bottom line is, you just don't cover Hendrix. All of Harper's original material on this mini-recording is outstanding live though, especially the intimate "Forever," which displays the ethereal quality of much of Harper's quieter songs.

Outside of the Hendrix mishap, Ben Harper Live is a fine complement to the outstanding The Will To Live. A- (J.S.)

"Ellen" bids adieu to ABC in finale

By Frazier Moore
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Yep, it's over.

Or about to be. After tonight's one-hour finale on ABC at 9 p.m. EDT, "Ellen" fades from sight. Ellen Morgan makes her exit, as does the woman who plays her, Ellen DeGeneres, still seething over wrongs real and imagined.

Ellen, don't go away hurt. Never worry for a moment that the family values kingpins ever gained the upper hand. ABC didn't treat your series any worse than any other that isn't pulling its weight. So please don't succumb to victim mode. Just go away. You had your shot.

It seems so long ago when "Ellen" began, with a different title ("These Friends of Mine"), a different supporting cast, a different concept and a different agenda: to make viewers laugh without changing their world — neither of which it managed to do. While eventually it became a sitcom bold enough to be gay, even then "Ellen" didn't often get around to being funny. That's a big enough shortcoming. But worse, the series never reached a necessary state of equilibrium.

After five seasons of trial-and-error, "Ellen" never found itself, except in hot water. It became less about what was happening on the screen than what was erupting behind the scenes. Viewers come to sitcoms seeking comfort, not a crusade. Familiarity breeds contentment. At some point, "Ellen" needed to let up and let its audience catch up. But "Ellen" — which is to say Ellen DeGeneres — was unable or unwilling.

It was a year ago that a frenzy of hype attended DeGeneres' coming out as a lesbian.

"Yep, I'm Gay," she declared from the cover of Time, though on the news magazine "20/20," she pledged moderation for the first sitcom with a gay leading character. The sexual orientation of the Ellens Morgan and DeGeneres, said the actress, "doesn't mean I have to be some sort of poster child for anybody."

Then, last week, "PrimeTime Live" appraised this season's 21 episodes of "Ellen" and concluded that no fewer than 13 had primarily gay themes.

Once again interviewing the star, Diane Sawyer asked, "You made a decision that you'd rather be a pioneer than renewed?"

"Yes," said DeGeneres, who as TV's self-appointed Gay and Lesbian poster child managed to squander all the ratings surge and much of the goodwill she scored by coming out in the first place. That's a shame, because the very funny "Puppy Episode" got its point across without proselytizing — a truly Very Special episode that closed last season with high hopes for the series' future.

Even more successful as a plain-out funny hour, tonight's finale ends the series on a poignant note as another example of what "Ellen" might have been, and sadly wasn't. Titled "Ellen: A Hollywood Tribute," the hour is often zany and never less than charming, while addressing gay issues with a sure but delicate touch.

A mock retrospective of Ellen DeGeneres' career and a spoof of comedy history, the tribute recalls Ellen's years on the vaudeville circuit with Knuckles the Puppet. It unearths a rare clip of Ellen as host of a 1950s game show, "Who's the Commie?"

And then in the early 1960s, word got around that ABC was developing a new sitcom to be called "Ellen."

"It struck me that Ellen would be right for this," remembers DeGeneres' future co-star, Joely Fisher.

But first, the network had to consider, and reject, a number of better-known leading ladies. See decades-old screen tests of Cindy Crawford, Helen Hunt and Julianna Margulies — who, a bit confused, thought she was auditioning for the title role of "Mr. Ed."

Linda Ellerbee serves as host of the program, which features dozens of celebrity cameos, including the Rev. Donald Wildmon of the American Family Association. Just kidding.

And what about the newly discovered theme song, silly and dead-serious at the same time: "Who's happy and healthy and gay? It's Ell-Blenn!"

If there were any doubts before, the finale makes it clear: With a little more resourcefulness, DeGeneres could have put across her live-and-let-live message every week, while holding on to a large, contented audience.

But Ellen, not her audience, has to figure this out. Once she does... somebody, sign her up for a sitcom.

Another Sonic EVOL–ution

New York's Sonic Youth move backwards on their new A Thousand Leaves LP but do so in a way that's fresh and exciting.

Latest from Mary Higgins Clark & William Bernhardt

EXTREME JUSTICE
William Bernhardt
Ballantine

(AP) — Mystery novels with recurring characters offer readers a connection to a familiar person, a comfortable relationship with someone they already know and like.

But serial mysteries should still offer some sort of mystery. And what good is knowing a character when you also know exactly what he's going to do?

That's the problem with William Bernhardt's latest, Extreme Justice (Ballantine, $22.50), the seventh in his series featuring modest attorney Ben Kincaid.

This time, Kincaid has taken a break from practicing law, hoping to find his real love in music. He swears he'll never go back to law. But when the owner of the jazz club where he's playing is framed for murder — well, stop now if the suspense is killing you. There are some good secondary characters and it's too bad Bernhardt didn't focus on them and give Kincaid a rest.

Club owner Earl Bonner's background is glossed over, as is his relationship with the murder victim "Cajun Lily." And the members of Kincaid's band are also given the slight treatment.

Readers unfamiliar with the Justice series will be confused. There are references to Kincaid's former trials as well as to the nephew he helped rear.

The personal details about his wannabe girlfriend and former co-workers are thin and unsatisfying. Readers who follow the series will want to know more and newcomers will need more details to catch up.

Bernhardt needs a break from Kincaid. In Extreme Justice it's hard not to flip to the end to see if what you think will happen actually happens. No surprises there, so don't bother plodding through the mundane details between the covers.

Bernhardt's previous mysteries have been good ones. Perhaps he should have taken his own advice, retired the tired Kincaid and brought readers someone new. (Dawn Fallik)

YOU BELONG TO ME
Mary Higgins Clark
Simon & Schuster

(AP) — The inscription on the cheap turquoise ring is a familiar one: "You belong to me."

But it could help identify a killer who targets women traveling alone on cruise ships, in Mary Higgins Clark's new thriller, You Belong to Me (Simon & Schuster).

When her ship reached Hong Kong, Regina Clausen disembarked — and it was the last anyone saw of her. Three years later, an anonymous listener calls a radio talk show to say she might have a clue to Clausen's disappearance. The call sets off a chain of events that make the show's host suspect that someone close to her is a murderer.

You Belong to Me is among the latest hardcover novels of mystery and suspense, which include works by such favorites as Elliott Roosevelt, Edna Buchanan, William X. Kienzle, Peter Lovesey, Susan Dunlap, Robert Campbell and Rita Mae Brown. (Ron Berthal)

Now, that's what "experience" in its toughest form brings you — a fitting end to a long, tough struggle.

Even with all of the experience obtained writing for this paper, is this a fitting end to a long, tough struggle? Maybe. Maybe not. Ask me later. Yeah, I think so.

Experience is a good thing... whether positive or negative.

In conclusion, thanks could go to a number of people, but one person directly comes to mind — Emily Marino. An Arts and Living Editor a few years back, she was the only one who believed I could do "this," and without her encouragement, a W.E.B. Du Bois Library cubicle would be my home right now.

Also, thanks must go to three of my Photo Editors, Nathan Martin, Thang Vo and Kenneth W.P. Scott, and a couple of my fellow photo freaks, Paul Bilodeau and Chris Cesnek. couldn't have possibly made a better choice or picked a path that would have made me happier once I got here. While my mind's gone blank on several occasions due to fatigue and some other things, nothing will be looked back upon with disdain.

I could have missed thousands of late hours in the office, but I never would have gone to the College World Series.

I could have spent all that time actually doing school work, but I never would have been able to ask Jim Rudy about UConn and have him reply "I don't particularly like dark blue or wear dark blue." Thanks coach, but how about their soccer team?

I could have been home with a serious girlfriend, or even uptown looking for one, but I would have missed the endless M&M vs. dancing puck debate with Mr. MM.

I could have gone to Daytona Beach for Spring Break, but I would have missed dinner in Tallahassee.

Yeah, I could have missed the pain, but I'd of had to miss the dance. And, I wouldn't have missed it for the world.

Woods making return to top of golf's ranks

IRVING, Texas (AP) — Greatness is not supposed to come easy. The journey is as defining as the deeds. And it could be that the long, strange trip of Tiger Woods is giving him the experience to go with the talent.

A year ago, the Tiger Express rolled into the GTE Byron Nelson Classic off a victory over the best in the game at the Masters and was wrapped in words like "the biggest, the fastest, the first, the youngest, the best."

Yesterday, he strolled into the Four Seasons Resort and Club coming off a struggling victory at the BellSouth Classic over Jay Don Blake, Steve Flesh and Esteban Toledo.

"I wish my win last week was three weeks before," Woods said, referring to the Masters, where he finished eighth this year. Gone was the near-hysteria that surrounded Tigermania at its peak. Suddenly, what seemed unimaginable in the dizzy days after the 1997 Masters, might be true: Greatness will be something Woods will have to work for.

It's something Woods has known all along. But it is something that his adoring fans are learning reluctantly to accept.

A year ago, 27 TV cameras jammed into the media room at the Byron Nelson. There was standing room only as more than 300 reporters struggled for space.

Yesterday, a more modest nine TV cameras were on hand and about 50 people milled in the press room, only about half of whom were journalists.

While the tournament is sold out and has been for weeks, the atmosphere is much more that Woods is just one of many good, young players on hand rather than the only good, young player.

If the struggle to win at the BellSouth and the return to reality in his greeting at the Byron Nelson should tell Woods anything it is that for Tigermania to remain manic he will have to win.

And right now, Woods seems to be defining winning almost exclusively in terms of the four major championships.

"It's very simple," he said about his goals for the rest of this year. "I would like my game to peak three more times. That's about it."

Certainly, having his game in top form for the U.S. Open in June, the British Open in July and the PGA Championship in August is an admirable goal. But assuming he can turn his game on and off that easily — flipping the switch to high for the majors — might be a mistake.

"I play these tournaments, one, for fun and also to play golf and just compete," Woods said, almost dismissing the Byron Nelson as a practice round for the three majors yet to come this year. "But also I know that I like to have my game peak at the right time, just like I did last year at the Masters," he said. It might be that the best way to have his game peak for the majors would be to play a little more often.

When Woods finished his hectic 1997 season he said he was convinced that four at the most and much more likely three tournaments was all he could handle playing in a row.

Because Woods played the BellSouth last week, the Byron Nelson this week and most likely will be at Jack Nicklaus' Memorial Tournament at the end of May, it seems highly unlikely he will play the Colonial next week in nearby Fort Worth.

And that's a shame. It will be the first Colonial since the death of Ben Hogan in Fort Worth. Everyone should be there. Woods, as is his practice, won't let anyone know until the Friday deadline if he is playing the Colonial.

Next year, the BellSouth is moving to the week before the Masters. Because Arnold Palmer's Bay Hill Invitational and the Players Championship precedes it and the Masters follows it, it seems unlikely that Woods will play and go into Augusta working on a fourth consecutive tournament — unless he changes his notion about how many weeks in a row he can play.

And that would be a shame. Defending champions should show up. Woods is the defending champion this week at the Byron Nelson, and if he is to keep that title he will have to defeat a field that includes Ernie Els, Justin Leonard, Mark O'Meara, Jim Furyk and Phil Mickelson.

It might not be a major, but it is a PGA Tour event — and that's pretty darn good.

Asked who the best player in the world was right now, Woods paused and said: "I really don't know. You have to ask the public that."

And the best place he can pose the question is in tournaments.

Hallory Hunter out of Preakness hunt

BALTIMORE (AP) — Halory Hunter broke his left front leg this morning during a workout at Pimlico Race Course where he was preparing for Saturday's Preakness.

The colt, the fourth-place finisher in the Kentucky Derby, apparently took a misstep while galloping on the wet track, according to a veterinarian, Dr. Dan Dreyfuss.

Dreyfuss said Halory Hunter was being taken to the New Bolton Center in Kennett Square, Pa., for surgery. The fracture was in the colt's left front fetlock, one of most serious injuries a racehorse can suffer, he said.

Bird tabbed as coach of the year

INDIANAPOLIS (AP) — Larry Bird the coach is picking up where he left off as Larry Bird the superstar player — winning games, awards and praise from just about everyone.

Bird, who never coached at any level until this season with the Indiana Pacers, won the NBA Coach of the Year Award yesterday, just the fourth rookie to do so. Not bad for the "Hick from French Lick," whose ability to handle the job in his home state was doubted even before the season began.

He not only handled it, he led the Pacers to their best winning percentage ever (.707) and their best record (58-24) since joining the NBA in 1976. Even more remarkable is that his team, which didn't even make the playoffs last year, is on the verge of advancing to the Eastern Conference finals.

"In a time when the 'in' thing may be to yell and scream, act crazy and draw attention... here's a coach that simply coaches the game, prepares his team, believes in us," Indiana guard Mark Jackson said. "He has faith and trust in us and allows us to go out and play the game and never panics."

In his coaching debut, Bird impressed voters just as he did when he won the NBA Rookie of the Year award in 1980 and was the league's most valuable player three times during a 13-year career with the Boston Celtics.

He was an overwhelming choice of the national panel of sports writers and broadcasters who voted. Bird got 50 of the 116 votes, more than the next three coaches combined. Utah's Jerry Sloan was second with 29, followed by Cleveland's Mike Fratello with 15 and Miami's Pat Riley with 5.

Also receiving votes were: Phoenix' Danny Ainge and Seattle's George Karl (4 each); Boston's Rick Pitino and Chicago's Phil Jackson (3 each); and Orlando's Chuck Daly, New Jersey's John Calipari and New York's Jeff Van Gundy (1 each).

"I'm not a great coach. I've got great people around me and everybody does their job," said Bird, giving much of the credit to his players and assistant coaches, Dick Harter and Rick Carlisle. "I feel very honored to receive such a fine award. Our goal is to win a championship. If we don't win a championship, I'll feel that we failed this year."

The award is the latest in a lengthy list of achievements for Bird, an All-American in his senior year at Indiana State when he led his undefeated team into the NCAA championship game, where it lost to Magic Johnson's Michigan State team. Bird went on to win three NBA championships with Boston.

"You just put success and Larry Bird together," said the Pacers' Chris Mullin, a teammate of Bird on the 1992 Olympic gold medal team. "You just expect it. But, the one thing is it just doesn't happen. The same things that make him a great player, make him a great coach — dedication, hard work, being consistent."

On the court, Bird spent most of his time on the bench and showed remarkable calm when his players didn't perform up to expectations. From the first day of training camp, Bird demanded that his players be on time, work hard in practice and be unselfish in games.

"I'm no dummy. I knew they had a pretty good basketball team before I stepped into this," Bird said. "What I thought I could bring here was some leadership."

The adjustment to Bird wasn't immediate as Indiana opened 2-5. Since then they have lost two games in a row only once — Dec. 8-10 in road games with Utah and Portland.

Bird's decision to allow his players to perform without constant play-calling and instructions from the bench has paid off. The Pacers have a 3-1 lead over the New York Knicks in their best-of-7 Eastern Conference semifinal series, with Game 5 at Market Square Arena tonight.

"Having a coach that had been there as a player helped," said Antonio Davis, one of the team's top reserves. "He's allowed us to play basketball. He's instilled a lot of confidence in us that we can go out and get the job done."

The three other rookie coaches to win the award were Harry Gallatin with St. Louis in 1962-63, Johnny Kerr with Chicago in 1966-67 and Mike Schuler with Portland in 1986-1987.

Want to fill this space next year?

Student comic submissions are currently being accepted for consideration for a space in the fall.

Strip cartoons must be drawn to fit in a 2" x 6 1/4" space. They may be drawn at percentage enlargements of that; for example, 150% would be 3" x 9 3/8", 200% would be 4" x 12.5".

Cartoons must be drawn in black ink; paint, felt tip markers and flair pens work best. Ballpoint pens are banned because they photocopy horribly. No. 2 pencil and blue ink do not work well either.

Cartoons will be judged both on artistic quality as well as content. Racist, sexist, homophobic and anti-Semitic material will not be printed. Cartoons may also be rejected on the grounds of poor taste, such as vulgarity.

There is great competition for space on the page. Judgement for space rests solely with the managing editor. Please submit material before the end of final examination period, as many spaces will be assigned over the summer break.

Drop off a photocopy of your original artwork in the mailbox marked "Cartoon Submissions" in the Collegian newsroom, 113 Campus Center. Please include your full name, academic year, current address and phone number and a phone number you may be reached at during summer break. Our office hours are Mon-Fri, 9 a.m.-5 p.m. Any inquiries about the fall 1998 comics page may be made to Victoria Groves, 545-1809.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — Everything you do at this time carries your unique stamp. You can have others wanting more from you for quite some time.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — It shouldn't take you very much time at all today to figure out just where you should be heading — and what means you should use to get there.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You've been assuming that certain beliefs were indispensable to you, but today you may realize that you're actually more liberated than you thought.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — It's essential that you strive for more direct and thoughtful communication with others today. You can't afford to leave messages undelivered.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You may have others thinking one thing about you while a certain someone knows that the truth is quite different. This is a delicate situation.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — Don't wait too long before getting started today. You'll have some time to think things through ahead of time, but there's no substitute for action.

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — What you are saying and what you are doing today must go hand in hand; you can't afford to have others see you as inconsistent or hypocritical.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You must take care that someone you've always considered a friend doesn't start taking advantage of you simply because you allow it.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Pay attention to the signs around you today and you can benefit from some unexpected knowledge — and a little practical advice.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You must know where to draw the line today between fact and fiction. Once you begin to confuse the two, others are likely to pass you by.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — You are likely to have something to brag about by the day's end — provided you don't let the nay-sayers have their way. Keep forging ahead.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You needn't subject yourself to anything truly hazardous today. Safety is an issue both at home and at the workplace right now.

VT ends UMass' season for second year in a row

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

In many different respects, the Massachusetts baseball team deserved to beat Virginia Tech in yesterday's Atlantic 10 Tournament semifinal matchup.

Then again, in other respects, it didn't.

The Minutemen nearly overcame a sub-par performance from junior All-Atlantic 10 second team selection Bill Cooke, as they scored four times in the seventh inning to trim a 7-2 Hokies lead to 7-6.

Meanwhile, Ryan Cameron entered the game in relief of Cooke in the sixth and was cruising along. All in all, he tossed four scoreless innings while allowing only two hits and fanning six, but most importantly, gave his team the chance to rally back.

And so they did with those four runs in the seventh, and looked to tie the game in the eighth. Shaun Skeffington led off the inning with a double off reliever Jon Hand, and stood on second base with no outs.

After that, the strategy seemed simple. With No. 2 hitter Bryan Mazzaferro up at the plate and the heart of the order following right behind him, it all seemed academic that the Minutemen would tie the game.

However, some things are easier said than done.

Skeffington was then picked off by Hand on a questionable call, deflating the UMass rally. Now, instead of bunting Skeffington over to third base, Mazzaferro followed with a strikeout. Muchie Dagliere then hit a fly ball to left to end the inning, one that could have been the game-tying sacrifice fly, but instead was the third out of the inning.

Cameron would hold the Hokies down again in the ninth, but the Minutemen went down quietly in order in the bottom of the frame, putting a sour end to what was a sweet season.

The Hokies jumped on Cooke early, and staked their freshman hurler Pat Pinkman, to a 4-0 lead. UMass cut that deficit in half to 4-2 on an RBI single by Seth Kaplan and a sacrifice fly by Skeffington.

Virginia Tech struck for three more in the top of the fourth. Catcher Barry Gouch had the big hit in the inning, a two-run single, while the final run came home on an error by Kaplan.

Pinkman was experiencing smooth sailing into the fifth, when the Minutemen put runners on the corners with one out. However, the rookie battled to get back to back full count strikeouts on Pete Gautreau and Brian Samela to end the threat.

After a scoreless sixth inning on both sides, Pinkman found himself in trouble again in the seventh, as the Minutemen loaded the bases with no outs. After Gautreau drove home a run thanks to a catcher's interference call, Aaron Braunstein followed with a two-run single which made it 7-5.

Gautreau, however, was then picked off by Hand for the second out of the inning. Matt Wolcott then plated Braunstein with an RBI single to make it 7-6, but UMass would not cross the plate again.

Braunstein led the way for UMass with a three-hit afternoon, while Dagliere, Wolcott and Kaplan all added two hits apiece.

Monday's game also marked the final game for Dagliere, Gautreau, Wolcott, Jeff Puleri and Scott Barnsby.

THANG VO / COLLEGIAN

Despite falling to Virginia Tech yesterday in the semifinals of the Atlantic 10 tournament, the Massachusetts baseball team finished up the season with a 27-12 mark.

A look back at UMass through the eyes of two seniors

Robert Frost once said something to the effect that when the choice of traveling on the "road less travelled" was presented to him, he chose said road. As a barely graduating English/Collegian major, I've interpreted that as a call to investigate the intricacies of life, and the choice of the long and winding road of true experience as a good thing.

Yet, herein lies a statement about my brief tenure as an English scholar/wannabe — out of all the quotations on the benefit of the road less travelled (i.e. "experience") that could be used, I choose one of the cheesiest and overused of its kind. It's everywhere, especially on those oh-so inspirational posters you buy a second cousin for their birthday... on the way to the party... at CVS, or something.

Another statement about my brief tenure as a English scholar/wannabe lies herein as well — I had to ask my housemate, who has a hard time discerning the difference between Robert Frost and Scott Frost (i.e. ex-Nebraska quarterback), who was the author of this quotation.

It's true. A Sports Management major had to inform me about one of the most recognizable pieces of verse in the English language. Awful, but true. However, the quote itself succinctly encapsulates on one hand my college/Collegian experience, and on the other my life.

As you've noticed, I was never destined to be an English scholar. In fact, the daft misuse of this quote from Frost is proof, and can be used as the judge, jury and executioner. After hours of banging my head on Bartlett Hall walls, the realization that college is about "experience" came to me, as opposed to spending my life in Alfred Lord Tennyson's Ivory Tower — or, in this case, a Tower library cubicle (note: I know it is called the W.E.B. DuBois library, but for metaphorical purposes, I use the old name).

I wanted to do "this," and by my fourth year of a pre- planned five-year college experience, the thought of spending the next five to 10 years writing about other people's writing (i.e. the more travelled road) instead of writing what I want to write was not for me. At the heart of its definition, English scholarship emphasizes taking an overly polemical stance in your writing as well.

So, the scholar has to believe he/she knows everything.

No one knows everything, and knowledge does not always breed enlightenment. Experience breeds enlightenment. Hence, the road less travelled diverges from standardized methods of cookie-cutter "experience." Wow, good stuff, eh?

Concerning my life, a young, yet infinitely wise-for-his- age, sports writer said the thing he admired about me the most was the choice of the "road less travelled." At 29- years-old, no wife, kids and a job with two weeks paid vacation a year are in my imminent future — but I have seen things only few can lay claim to.

I've seen the sunrise over the hills of Budapest and the Twin Towers of New York City... the sunset over Old Towne in Stockholm and a double-overtime NCAA women's soccer match on the outskirts of Boston... walked through the hills of the Lake District in Northwestern England with a woman I loved as a friend, but was never destined to love... sang Scottish (not English) football songs during a A-10 semifinal match between UMass and GW on a cold and windy night in Kingston, R.I.... wrestled around in a drunken haze with a man who now earns penalty minutes as a paying job in the IHL... wrestled around with a Class 5 rapid called "The Terminator" on the Upper Penobscot River, and then watched the world flow past me for a minute or so from the bottom of the river... read Keats over wine and cheese in Les Jardins des Tuilleries in Paris during springtime .. waking from a mid-afternoon nap, I then witnessed a Victorian-style wedding on St. Stephen's Green in Dublin... sat courtside at the NCAA basketball tournament in Atlanta in 1998, and Syracuse in 1993... and said goodbye (hopefully not forever) to someone beyond special at an airport in Manchester, England.

Truthfully, going on like this is not meant to prove I have a higher worth — going on like this is to prove that "experience" (i.e. the road less travelled) has a higher worth. Before all of you get involved with a person/career/life, "experience" life. Please.

A definite experience has been covering sports on and off during the past four years for this paper. While covering hockey for two and a half years was not a successful one in the win-loss column, it did fill a part of me lost in a forced retirement from the sport, and I had some real quality time with a few of our seniors. Yes, I was a jock once, which is hard to believe if you've ever met me.

Covering women's soccer for two years was a very successful one in the win/loss column, and the strong ties made with the team will last for years to come. Actually, all of "this" started with an experience six years ago last fall — before I attended UMass. Hard to believe, eh?

Jorma Kansanen

Walking past a sun-drenched Garber Field, I saw the Minutewomen beating up on some team. Thinking of writing for "this" when I started school here the next year, and having read a lot about the team, I checked the game out. Looking at the stands filled with fans singing and pounding drums, I said to myself, "Geez, if a sport like women's soccer gets this kind of support at this university, then I have to get involved." So, blame them.

Through my term here, lessons have been learned, but an important one was sports "like women's soccer" have just as much legitimacy as men's basketball; especially at UMass, where women's soccer has a stronger sense and history of success than men's basketball will ever have.

Seeing the de-emphasis of this program over the past four years has pained me, and it is unimaginable what this has done to the Minutewoman alumni, and the current team and coaching staff. It's a sad, sad situation, while getting more and more absurd... yet, you can never give up hope.

Speaking of "experience," and the road less travelled, that is what covering women's lacrosse in one capacity or another for four years has been. When assigned the sport four springs ago, I was at the proverbial crossroads, and a decision had to be made — was "this" what I really wanted to do? Enough said.

The team took me in, believed in me and helped me prove to the people who didn't believe I could do "this" that I could. Remembering what I did yesterday might be a problem, but remembering the first time I met each member of this year's senior class — in what almost seems a half of a lifetime ago — is no problem. Thanks for the help, and all of you deserved to make it to the ECAC Championships.

"Talking to myself again,
Wondering if this travelling is good.
Is there something else a doing
We'd be doing if we could?
But, ah the stories we could tell.
And if it all blows up and goes to hell
I wish that we could sit upon a bed in some motel
And listen to the stories it could tell."

— Jimmy Buffett, calypso poet

If you've read my venting here over the past four years then you know that in addition to having more loose screws inside my head than the Titanic, my life isn't always a bed of roses. It's often a bed of dandelions. Beautiful and happy looking on the outside, the dandelion is really a weed, sucking the life out of your lawn's existence.

I occasionally get crabby and start to whine about things, but then the lovely Kathy Connors will buy me a barbecued chicken sandwich at Rafters, and all is well.

Working two full-time jobs for my first three and a half years, trying to get a GPA that doesn't top Roger Clemens' ERA and attempting to maintain a social life was arduous.

I often don't eat, sleep, drink or be merry. I heard a rumor the other day that I have a place in Puffton. I had roommates while I was in the dorms and never met them.

Life often leaves me beaten down, dazed and confused. It's driven me to drink on several occasions. It's left me spent, feeling like I'm barking up the wrong tree in the grand scheme of things.

Sometimes I wonder why I do all this, slaving away, day and night, for a paycheck smaller than the gate receipts for a Menudo reunion tour and Howard the Duck combined.

But then Cons buys me a large steak and cheese sub from D'Angelo's, and all is well.

Especially with the traveling aspect though, things can become delusional. Over one span this winter, I spent eight consecutive weekends in eight different states. Not that I minded altogether, because four of them were with the 16 liveliest ladies to be found on this campus. Also, to me, there's nothing better than going to bed in a different state than the one you woke up in. But it gets to you. I woke up Thursday in a nasty, orange-colored hotel room, and didn't realize I was on Long Island until I picked up the phone and held "Dis is youuuur wake-up caulll." If today is Wednesday, this must be Amherst.

Finding pleasure amidst the pain comes from all the amazing things that happen to you, the people you meet and the things they do on and off of the field. An entire weekend at URI sucks on the surface, but what do you make of it? How about a Saturday night in the spring of your senior year spent at the remote Red Lion Inn in rustic Blacksburg, Va., the morning before a 14-hour odyssey home? You just make the best of the situation as it presents itself and go with the flow. Washington's National Airport can be a lot of fun, it's just what you make of it.

Leigh Torbin

While I bitch and moan about how I'm never home and how I can't do so many things because I'm either out of town or in Boyden until well after last call, it's all the great moments and memories that will stay with me. It's the triple OT NCAA women's soccer win at Harvard, Hurricane Fat- pig in Orono and the donuts at BU hockey games.

It's the people you meet on the field, from the Pride of Tonawanda and the Drilling Marauder, all the way back to Miss Simi Valley and beyond. Also, it's the people you meet off of it and in press boxes.

That's what it's all about. It's awesome, baby!

There's been too much time spent driving every mile of highway in Hockey East with my "blatantly average" John Lennon look-alike co-writer as he rambles on about every band you tried to permanently forget from Cutting Crew to Damn Yankees. But that's what you remember. That's where you find solace amidst agony.

And if it doesn't work, then Cons buys me a turkey sub with dry spices at The Sub, and all is well.

But now, looking back on the memory of these four largely sleepless years, one moment stands out above all else in terms of not needing Frank Costanza to yell "serenity now" for me. It was Valentine's Day last year in the Valley of the Sun, and with our coaches remaining at the field to scout, the entire softball team crammed itself into one van.

The UMass Softball Choir harmonized on "Copacabana," "Sweet Caroline" and others." Riding shotgun, I scanned the dial and later came across "The Dance" by Garth Brooks.

The dwindling piano solo at the end gently rolled on. Riding on the Hohokam Expressway, the lights went down on the city of Phoenix to our left, and the lights came up on the college-suburb of Tempe to our right. The setting sun cast spectacular hues in all directions of the desert sky.

After days of screaming from the diverse group, clamoring for everything from "No Diggity," to Lord only knows what, Becky George, Mandy Galas, Chris Martens and others, the silent majority with great taste, got their way. We rode on with the melodic piano in our ears and a warm breeze in our hair and the especially painful period in my life that had recently concluded was no more.

For a moment, all the world was right.

When you step off that plane, when you first feel the icy chill of the northern air in the gap between the plane and the jetway, then the harsh reality sets in. You have to do weekly reporting for softball and track, along with player of the week nominees. You have to do your weekly notes, fax stuff to most of the free world, and expect to sleep a day later.

That's when you fondly recall the experimental stout at the Portsmouth Brewery or the Foghorn Leghorn PA announcer in Georgia saying "the catcher, Kelley Bookbley."

That's also when Cons buys me a big bowl of clam chowder at The Pub or a bowl of salmon ravioli at Pasta E Basta, and all is well. If I'm really lucky, Bert's buying steak at Outback. Now, that's worth waiting nine hours for, one-three. They even cook it for you there; no fuss with your smoke alarm.

Sometimes life just gets dictated to you by this line of work. I don't even know if I'll be at my own graduation next weekend and it isn't even in my own hands. It's all resting on Harry's strong right arm. I might be at McGuirk. I might be in Oklahoma City. It's all up to the big kid.

But in so many ways, I'm glad I don't know the way it all will end, the way it all will go. It's fitting.

I was never supposed to come here in the first place. It was my last choice and amidst much initial chagrin became my home. In retrospect I

UMASS '98 BEST

WHAT IS UMASS BEST?

Each day, University of Massachusetts students scurry around the valley shelling out their hard–earned cash for goods and services trying desperately to seek a place to unwind off campus. But with so many alternatives in the area, which ones are the best?

Last month, The Collegian conducted a poll of students to find out what places and businesses they deemed UMass' best. Once again, as we have for years, we are publishing our findings. After sorting through piles of ballots representing a wide cross section of the student population, checking and double checking our work, we have tabulated the results and compiled them in this easy reference guide.

To our winners and runners up, congratulations. With such a diverse student body you should be proud of the recognition — it's not often that a group of UMass students can agree on the same thing.

Sit back, relax, leaf through these pages and see how well your favorite places fared.

Indians debate nuclear testing program

NEW DELHI, India (AP) — When Dhirendra Sharma organizes anti-nuclear marches in New Delhi, he's accused of being a CIA agent. Fellow activist Vandana Shiva can't understand why Indians aren't more concerned that their schools and roads are crumbling even as the country pursues a costly nuclear program.

India's tiny disarmament community says the country's chest-thumping response to this week's five nuclear test explosions — three Monday and two more yesterday — demonstrates the difficulty of getting its message across.

For the most part, the movement's activities are confined to writing op-ed pieces and organizing poorly attended discussions every Aug. 6, the anniversary of the day in 1945 when the United States dropped an atomic bomb on Hiroshima, Japan.

"I cannot mobilize Indians to come out to march against nuclear weapons. They don't know what atom bombs are. They are worried about their daily bread," said Sharma, a retired philosophy professor who has been agitating against nuclear power and weapons since his students days in England in the early 1960s.

NYC cabbies hold one-day protest strike

NEW YORK (AP) — You want nice? We'll show you nice. Thousands of New York taxi drivers went on strike Tuesday in a one-day protest against proposed new rules aimed at making cabbies more courteous. The strike brought unaccustomed quiet to the city's streets but meant big headaches for many New Yorkers and visitors, some of whom gave up looking for a cab and either walked or took the subway or the bus.

"It's an inconvenience," said Tom Blum, 39, of Manhattan, who was among those who had to wait in long lines for a cab at LaGuardia Airport in Queens. "The taxi system is one of the aspects of New York you can always count on."

The city has 12,200 cabs. Police said only about 200 were on the streets of Manhattan.

The "yellow flu" was prompted by tougher rules proposed last month as part of Mayor Rudolph Giuliani's campaign to make the city more civil.

The Taxi and Limousine Commission is proposing drug tests for drivers, a ban on smoking and blaring music, and fines of up to $150 for ignoring or cursing customers. Other fines would triple or quadruple, some escalating to license revocation. The commission votes on the rules May 28.

Biju Mathew, a strike organizer for the taxi drivers, who are not unionized, said the cabbies want more respect and a hand in rule-making.

SGA hears from mother of deceased UM student

KEN MC DONALD / COLLEGIAN

Barbara Prentice, whose son Adam died last September after falling through the Morrill Greenhouse roof, spoke at the final SGA meeting of the school year last night.

By Jill Carroll
Collegian Staff

Barbara Prentice spoke to the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) last night concerning her son's death in September.

Prentice asked the SGA to inform students about her son's death and bring forth evidence surrounding the incident.

"I hope you'll take the time to spread information to others because it might really be the piece that fits the puzzle," Prentice said.

According to the police report, Adam Prentice died due to blood loss during Homecoming weekend after falling through a Morrill Greenhouse roof.

Ms. Prentice felt there were problems with the investigation of her son's death.

"At 1:30 a.m., the UMass police department found Adam collapsed on the grass outside the greenhouse. No one has ever identified Adam inside the greenhouse," Prentice said.

Ms. Prentice said it was improbable that Adam fell through a greenhouse roof.

"Indeed the physical evidence remaining, which is his body, had no cuts scratches or punctures aside from the eight inch stab wound to his back. I believe it is most improbable Adam fell through glass then busted out of glass [onto the greenhouse lawn] and only received one cut on his entire body," Prentice said.

Ms. Prentice stated that according to the medical examiner, alcohol was not a factor in her son's death.

Police looking into two alleged attacks near Governors Dr.

COURTESY UMV POLICE

A composite sketch of the man suspected to be involved in an alleged attack on Governors Drive Tuesday night.

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts police are increasing patrols in the vicinity of Governors Drive and the William D. Mullins Center after two female students alleged they were physically assaulted in the area.

On Tuesday evening at approximately 10 p.m., a female individual jogging on Governors Drive reported that she was "grabbed from behind and pulled to the ground," UMass Police Chief John Luippold said.

The victim was able to free herself at which time the assailant fled the scene, Luippold said.

The victim described the male — who appears in the composite above — as a Caucasian male, 5-foot-8-inches, slender build, 25-35 years old, short brown hair and possibly balding and with a long face.

In addition to this report, UMass police also received a second report Tuesday from a female who was allegedly assaulted in the area of parking lot 25, which is located behind the parking office trailer on Governors Drive.

The victim described the assailant as a white male with medium build and light brown hair. However, no composite was available for her description at the time of print.

Although the UMass police are not sure if the two assaults were committed by the same perpetrator, Luippold said, "we are very concerned about the similarities in regards to the descriptions as well as the geographical location."

Due to the assault reports, Luippold said he has increased the patrols in the area of parking lot 25 and Governors Drive and also encourages students to take advantage of resources available to them.

"Student should utilize the escort service, especially the van that escorts students from the parking lots. Students should call for an escort from the help phones and get back into their vehicles and wait for escort to arrive," Luippold said.

In addition, Luippold advised that students should always walk in groups.

Anyone who may have information regarding either of these assaults or have observed an individual matching the above description should contact the UMass Police Community Disorders Unit at 545-0893 or call the UMass TIPS line at 577-8477.

Levitz murderer sentenced

By Jason Trenkle
Collegian Staff

The murderer of former University of Massachusetts student Jeffrey Levitz was sentenced to 22 years to life in prison yesterday in Albany, N.Y.

Nineteen year-old James Bowles pled guilty to one count of second-degree murder and admitted to killing Levitz on Feb. 2, 1997 in Colonie, N.Y.

Levitz, of 45 Maple St. in Stoughton, was visiting an aunt in Troy, N.Y. when Bowles shot him in the head and killed him when Levitz refused to hand over money.

Witnesses reported seeing Bowles and Levitz leaving a party in Troy shortly before the murder.

Authorities discovered further connections between Bowles and Levitz. Levitz reportedly had $1,000 cash and drugs that Bowles had stolen. Prosecuters accused Bowles of creating plans to rob Levitz at the party.

According to investigators, Bowles and Levitz's past records went beyond their interactions in the murder. In fact, on Feb. 5, Levitz's car was discovered near Bowles' home.

When Levitz failed to return to Amherst, his parents hired a private detective to search for their son.

Levitz's body was discovered on Easter Sunday in 1997 by a hiker hiking through the undeveloped wooded area of a housing development off Forts Ferry Road in Colonie. Authorities consulted Levitz's dental records in order to make a positive identification on the body.

Bowles was charged on four counts, including first-degree murder, one count of first-degree robbery and one count of second-degree criminal possession of a weapon.

His plea satisfies all the counts he was accused of.

Levitz was a student at UMass until he withdrew in the winter of 1997 to pursue a music career. His goal was to play for a professional rock group. He planned to return to UMass to study to become a teacher if his music career didn't work out.

"Jeff did have goals," Deborah Levitz told the Daily Hampshire Gazette. "He had so many talents and there were so many creative avenues open to him — paths that he'll never get to walk."

EPA licenses nuclear dump in N. Mexico

By Sue Major Holmes
Associated Press

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. — The Environmental Protection Agency yesterday licensed the federal government's $1.8 billion nuclear waste dump in the subterranean salt beds of southeastern New Mexico. The long-awaited ruling means shipments of radioactive defense waste could begin rolling to the Waste Isolation Pilot Plant near Carlsbad by mid-June — unless halted by a court fight promised by environmentalists.

One of the chief opponents — the Southwest Research and Information Center — said Tuesday it will sue both the EPA and the U.S. Department of Energy, which owns the repository, before the end of a 30-day period for final certification.

The repository has been planned for 24 years, and Congress authorized its development in 1979. The EPA today ruled the repository can safely contain the waste and that it complies with the agency's standards for radioactive waste disposal.

"We're confident that if this is litigated, we'll be successful," Richard Wilson, acting assistant administrator for the EPA's Office of Air and Radiation, said yesterday.

"At EPA almost anything we do runs the risk of one side or the other bringing litigation," he said. "Our first responsibility is to the public to make sure our decisions are accu-

UM grows Ripe Peach

By Joseph D. Savitch

The future of journalism is changing.

The University of Massachusetts journalism department is launching a pilot Internet-based publication, The Ripe Peach, through a new class "Producing Internet Publications."

Adjunct professor Ralph Loos, a full time designer for UMass, piloted the class this semester.

"This class is the first to my knowledge, there has never been a project like this before," Loos said.

The class's main accomplishment for this semester is its web based publication The Ripe Peach.

"This is a collaborative effort between all the students in journalism 393A, to create a publication of broad ideas under one unique umbrella," Loos said.

The individual class members created different web pages with a variety of topics.

"I wanted to create social awareness in my page," Ron Ventresca a senior journalism major said. "It's something that I feel everyone needs," he said.

Other topics included how to find and interview for a job, bar hopping, planning weddings and art.

"Journalism is building up to visual literacy. The focus of this class is to help people who are good with words be good at expressing them in other forms," Loos said.

The journalism department is evaluating this elective course on its success and student response.

This course is not scheduled for next fall, but based on its success Loos feels it will be available next spring and hopes that one day it will be an integral part of the journalism curriculum. The Internet is a newly developing field that many people are discovering and Loos hopes that journalism will responsibly tackle the field and make it a good forum for the media.

Loos feels this form of media is just as important as print media.

"On-line journalism is a growing industry," Ben DeLong, a senior Bachelor's Degree with Individual Concentration (BDIC) major said. "We need more classes like this across the country at colleges and universities," he said.

Most major newspapers including the Boston Globe, New York Times and USA Today have web sites. These sites are not used to substitute for the paper, but to raise awareness and extend the paper to people who would not be able to read it otherwise.

"The web will never replace print media, it will only enhance it," DeLong said.

This class incorporated many aspects of design in addition to preparing copy for the Internet. Students focused on advertising design and basic Adobe Photoshop work for the first three quarters of the semester to obtain the fundamental ideas of design.

The Web site for Ripe Peach is http://www.umass.edu/journal/theripepeach and will be launched next Wed. May 20.

Cannes underway

By Christopher Burns
Associated Press

CANNES, France — Glitz and global politics mixed at yesterday's opening of the Cannes Film Festival, where the U.N. chief Kofi Annan joined John Travolta to watch a movie about a skirt-chasing presidential candidate.

"It's very enchanting," Annan said of the Cannes scene.

About 2,000 people gathered outside the red-carpeted steps of the festival palace Wednesday to watch what will be a nightly procession of stars for the next 11 days. Twenty-two films are competing for the coveted Golden Palm.

"It feels like Hollywood," said one in the crowd, 16-year-old Rashelle Marco of Toronto. "It's a big fashion show."

Meanwhile, a star-packed film jury led by director Martin Scorsese outlined its judging criteria.

"What I look for in a film is an experience that illuminates something in me that I was unaware of before, and actually takes me to another place," Sigourney Weaver told a news conference. "I have to feel it in my stomach," fellow actress and juror Winona Ryder said.

The 10-member jury will view works by former Cannes laureates and young new directors. In the running are films by Britons John Boorman and Ken Loach, Denmark's Lars Von Trier, and Americans Hal Hartley and John Turturro.

Commingling art and politics, the festival was opening yesterday night with a showing of Primary Colors, Mike Nichols' film about a philandering governor running for president, starring Travolta, and a commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the signing of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

Annan was at the festival to mark that anniversary.

As always, the 51st Cannes Film Festival will be a combination of cinema as high art and as hard-core business, with the Riviera as an attractive backdrop.

rate."

The EPA's final certification runs 10,000 pages, including documentation, he said.

Energy Secretary Federico Pena also must sign off on the project. The Department of Energy promised a major announcement later today.

The EPA gave preliminary approval last October to the repository, dug out of the vast salt beds left by a sea that covered the area 250 million years ago.

The final ruling certifies the $1.8 billion facility to bury plutonium-contaminated clothing, tools, equipment and sludge generated as a byproduct of decades of nuclear weapons work. The DOE is considering a plan to store spent reactor fuel and other highly radioactive waste at Yucca Mountain, 90 miles northwest of Las Vegas.

Over the facility's estimated 30-year life, it would receive about 37,000 shipments, largely from federal sites in California, Colorado, Idaho, Illinois, Nevada, New Mexico, Ohio, Tennessee, South Carolina and Washington. The first truckloads would come from Los Alamos National Laboratory in northern New Mexico, Rocky Flats in Colorado and the Idaho National Engineering and Environmental Laboratory.

The EPA's certification requires that DOE prove that any waste being shipped to the repository is the kind for which the repository is designed. The sites that generate the waste must make sure they have procedures to assure that, Wilson said.

"The medical examiner listed the official cause of death in both the autopsy and the death certificate as a stab wound of glass that lead to massive loss of blood. There is absolutely no mention of alcohol playing a role in his death. This was not an alcohol-related death," Prentice said. "The facts prove Adam was more injured than not, rather than more loaded than not."

Ms. Prentice said Adam had a blood alcohol level of 0.12.

"Shortly after his death, the medical examiner released that his blood level was only 0.12 so I want to ensure you that the ban on alcohol was not due to my son," Ms. Prentice said.

Ms. Prentice felt foul play was the reason for Adam's death.

"I believe a more probable explanation for his death is foul play," Ms. Prentice said.

Ms. Prentice felt she was not notified in time about the incident.

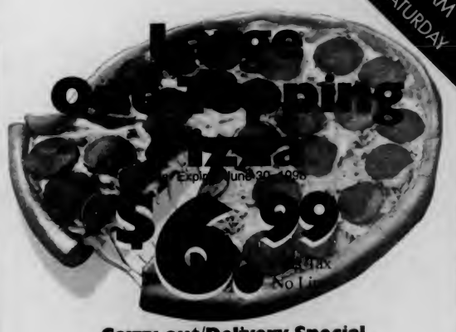
"I was not notified by this incident until the doctor who pronounced him dead called at 4:30 a.m. and was I told to call the University police for details. Upon calling the University, I was put on hold for ten minutes by officials then told I would have to call back because the investigating detective didn't have any information," Ms. Prentice said.

Student trustee Brian Tirrell said the incident was an example of students being violated.

"Things like this when they perceive 'oh he's just a drunken student' they don't give him proper medical attention he could have been given and that's the kind of thing that can happen. Students at parties are beaten without provocation. It happens it really does," Tirrell said.

President of the SGA Sabwa Shamapande recommended starting a coordinating council to look into the processes of the investigation of Prentice's death.

"I'm possibly going to call a coordinating council or something. We owe it to her son as a fellow student to find out about the processes about certain things," Shamapande said.



In other business during the meeting, the SGA held elections for the speaker and associate speaker for next year.

Lisa Cook was elected speaker and Jodi Bailey was elected associate speaker.

Resisting globalization

Dan Bodah

Recently the Mexican government, with support from its northern neighbor the United States, has been moving to expel a number of foreigners. In fact, the government has been trying to imply that these foreigners are behind the Zapatista National Liberation Army (EZLN), which is actually a dissident army mostly made up of indigenous campesinos from the southern Mexican state of Chiapas, on the Guatemalan border. On December 31, 1993, the EZLN declared war on the Mexican government, launching one of the most coherent and long-lived contemporary revolutions.

It was no mistake that the uprising was timed to match the beginning of the North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA). The Zapatistas (as the EZLN and their supporters are usually called) saw that NAFTA in particular, and globalization of economies in general, was behind the miserable conditions prevalent in their home. When an area such as Chiapas, whose natural resources provide wealth to investors and large companies, is full of poverty and lacks the basic civil infrastructure of the modern world, something needs to be done. After struggling to achieve change through reforms within the Mexican system, the Zapatistas took matters into their own hands. From the beginning, the Zapatista uprising has had a distinctly different character than most revolutions. It is distinguished by an understanding that the struggle in Chiapas is intimately linked to the struggles of people elsewhere. American workers and poor also suffer from NAFTA. In fact, the people of the world in general stand to lose from the globalization project. The Zapatistas have from the start maintained close contact with the outside world through the Internet and by hosting a steady stream of international observers and visitors. As a result, the conflict has been in the open; the Zapatistas carry out their struggle in the light of public awareness.

This public awareness is important in providing alternative information from that available in the mainstream press, which is often subject to government intervention. But of course, any revolution needs a propaganda machine, so how is the Zapatista rebel lion different?

The Zapatistas have used their propaganda network to deliver jokes and poetry! The humor and sense of beauty and wonder that comes across so clearly from so many of the Zapatista communiques stands in stark contrast to the typical dogmatism and rhetoric of most radical movements. It shows that the Zapatistas are not motivated by hatred and anger, but by a genuine vision of a better world. The struggle of the Zapatistas has not been without a great deal of pain. The government and its supporters have committed a number of atrocities, from mass murders in Ocotingo, to the more recent and well-publicized massacre of 48 campesinos in Acteal. The latter occasion created a huge scandal and was somewhat prominent in the U.S. media. As many as 60 gunmen methodically attacked and wiped most of a huge group of unarmed Indians, shooting more than 25 of them in the back. Four pregnant mothers died in the attack. Local authorities, who were aware that the attack was occurring, told those who called in to report it that there was nothing going on.

The Partido Revolucionaria Institucionalizada (PRI), which has ruled Mexico for over 65 years, conducted a damage control campaign following the Acteal massacre — made necessary, remember, only because the Zapatistas have such a powerful communication and news network. Expendable officials were punished, their actions denounced by the PRI they served. None of this was quite enough to clear the air completely, though. So now the PRI is trying to frame the whole Zapatista revolution as the work of foreign infiltrators, intent on stealing the rich natural resources in Chiapas which belong to Mexico. It's a clever ploy, and the irony is rich with implications of Newspeak. The international solidarity network the Zapatistas have established in their struggle to gain control of their own lives, their own home land, is being accused of stealing that very control. If only the campesinos of Chiapas would trust their Mexican government, the logic of the oppressor goes, they would not lose the riches of Chiapas to foreign interests. Indeed. Surely the Mexican government will not continue to let those riches be siphoned of into the coffers of foreign mineral, lumber, and oil companies, as they have done in the past.

What is so wonderful and special about the Zapatista revolution is exactly this international unity in support of local goals. The Zapatistas have made it clear that they want friends who support them, not outsiders who join them. They want to provide us with an example and inspiration as they accomplish their own process of liberation, so that we can focus on our own struggle. As Okanagan poet and educator Jeanette Armstrong has said, "This is the first action of this sort that goes beyond local concerns. It is the first resistance, the first violent resistance, to the global economy."

We can unite in this resistance, but we must fight it for ourselves, in our own homes, or else we are simply imposing another sort of globalization, a global revolution with a central command no different from the World Bank or the International Monetary Fund in essential ways.

Remembering Amherst

Luke Meredith
Class of 1998

You mean I can't sleep until one, drink Natty from a can and waste loan money from Whitmore anymore?

Well, that sucks, because after four years I've become quite good at that.

The least they can do is give me one more column, before I learn the term "responsibility."

Bear with me. (Senior columns are full of crap about people you never heard of anyway).

I have to start by giving props to the best semester ever, spring 1995, because I lived on what could have been the greatest floor of all time — second floor, Baker. (Hey, what's up?)

Yeah, what's up.

The best collection of jocks, hippies, burnouts and alcoholics east of the Mississippi. We partied like animals, egged on by an R.A. who celebrated the last night of classes by bringing home Sugar Jones and promising a "cookie for a beer." He then helped a few more wasted souls rip down the fire alarm. Fire officials knocked on Housemate A and my door the next day, saying what happened to the fire alarm "was not a joke."

Yeah, Mike the R.A.

My props go out to Lou (you defined the term "slacker"), Mike C. (I was just a chubby goody-two shoes before I met you, you rebel bastard), Toby and "Shady" D. Blaney (the ultimate swingers), the Posse, the Clique, and all the kids down the wing who thought they were cool.

Another blast was last year, with Housemates A and B, and Sammy and Skip. I'll never forget Sammy's birthday, or drunken wiffleball, or college basketball watching (believe me, when you did it as much as we did, it takes on a life of its own), or the quote board (especially the X-rated quote board), or the parties. Others may live in 381, but they'll never live like we did.

Though that may not be a bad thing. They may actually get work done.

I'll never forget beating Housemate C in Sega (Duke 30, Florida 8), or the Hu-Ke-Lau. I will never forget "Chicken Finger Night," or "Cavatelli Supreme Night," or D.C. dream girls. I will never forget Heffe Hermosa, the Diggity-Dizz- on and the incredible Booty Schwag, or K-braham and Bungy in 96', what a crazy year that was. (When more than three people within 30 feet of your room own bongs of three or more feet in length, motivation becomes yesterday's news).

I'll never forget Natty Light, or Natty Ice, or going to most of the frats on campus (which, I'll admit, I've done), or Barbecue Chicken calzones from DP Dough, or Bueno. I'll never forget the night Housemate A got chucked in the slammer (with former UMass guard Andre Burks, no less), or the Wake Forest game.

I'll never forget the way Amherst looks at about 4:15 in the afternoon in December, the way the sun drapes the town and blankets the snow, making it seem even quieter than it already is. I'll never forget the way a sunset looks from the second floor of Baker, the way the sun sets as though Amherst is the only place in the world.

And anyone would be crazy to leave.

I'll never forget how scared I was when P.J. dropped me off in the fall of 1994, when I didn't know anyone. I'll never forget meeting Housemate A and Skip in line at the D.C. that first night, and how we were friends by the next weekend. I'll never forget the first time someone said they liked something I wrote, or the time someone stuck my Time-Out story on the doors of the now-closed bar.

I showed P.J. that one.

I'll never forget the first night I met Big Red, or every other day I spend with her. I'll never forget my friends, some here, some not. We may have smoked a bit too much in our day, we may have gotten a little too wasted, but in the end it all seemed to work out for the best.

These following people would kill me if I went through my whole career without putting their names in the paper.

Deb Sheehan, Courtney Leary, Michael Garvin, Jimmy White, Tom McGuiness, Teddy Priezner, Eric Schlumper, Jeff Becker, Sammy Steinlight, Dave Jaffe, Jeff Puleri, Seth Kaplan, Kayleen McNulty, Liz and Lindsey and Marcus Camby.

Well, not Camby. We never hung out or anything.

The rest of you, there you go. It's been a pleasure being "the kid who doesn't care about political crap," and if you want to keep reading my stuff, keep your ears open.

Maybe I'll be in a book somewhere, filed in G860 or something, under "Stories about P.J., Maggie Seaver, Housemate B, Teeth, and other assorted Collegian crap."

I guarantee I'll be the only one on that shelf.

Letters to the Editor

Support for Prof. Palmer

To the Editor:

The article written on Professor John Palmer that appeared in Wednesday's paper (5/13) was very alarming to me. I am a student in that class. I personally feel that Palmer is a great teacher that would never bring his opinions into class. Let me remind the public that the class is called "Biology of Social Issues." Social issues can be controversial, such as abortion and cloning, which are two of the issues that we covered in the class. Palmer never gave his opinion of the issue and showed several sides of popular opinions.

The people in the class that complained were rude and disruptive to the class and the professor. I feel bad for Palmer because he has been criticized for doing nothing wrong. I also feel that the Collegian did not write a fair article on this issue. I know that many people in the class feel that Prof. Palmer did his job and was not "offensive" or "harassing." I expected the Collegian to get all sides of the story, yet I feel that the majority opinion from the class was left out. That opinion is that Biology of Social Issues is a worth while course and that Professor Palmer is a decent teacher who was just doing his job.

Prof. Palmer did good job

To the Editor:

I am a student in Biology 105 and have never felt harassed by "language." Professor Palmer explained in a thought provoking and unbiased manner about a very dicey subject in this country. This is more than I can say about the article in yesterday's Collegian (5/13). A small minority of students in the class were able to push their political agenda on the front page. They are under the mistaken impression that "everyone is angry at this professor." If you were in class this afternoon you'll realize that most of the students were clapping and cheering for Palmer. If you look for offense in anything you will find it, instead look for the good. It's about time this PC nonsense stop impeding our freedom of speech.

Palmer's teaching was inappropriate

To the Editor:

In regards to the article on Professor John Palmer's class (5/13): I too took the class and have many of the same complaints which the nine students did. I commend them for voicing their complaints; as for Palmer's comment that nobody yet has complained, I would say that the explanation lies in the large number of freshmen in such General Education classes who are unsure of what actions to take if their professor acts as Palmer did.

He uses his class time to preach, and not to teach. As for his excuse that it is all "biological," I would like to learn where he learned the scientific term "killing babies" (or where he learned that the fetus is deemed a "baby" from conception onwards). Furthermore, I think it is highly inappropriate for any professor to call a student a "little girl." I feel his descriptions of abortion within the classroom are purposely graphic and over-the-top, only displaying his biased opinions further. It is difficult to separate personal opinions from sensitive issues, but clearly Palmer should know better than to deem abortion "killing babies." Also inappropriate were his lectures on HIV and AIDS.

SGA listening to JSU needs

To the Editor:

I just wanted to thank the members of the Student Government Association (SGA) for listening to Hillel/Jewish Student Union's concerns about the budget cut for 1999. Our voices were heard with respect and the JSU feels comfortable working with the SGA in the future. Many senators, especially members of the Young Republican Club, showed concern and a desire to work with us in the future. Even though we did not get the money we needed, we were not ignored and interest in us was made clear.

On behalf of the Jewish students of UMass, we thank the Senate.

Finals period good preparation

To the Editor:

I'd like to comment on the May 7 editorial by Joe Sullivan about the validity of our grading system, and perhaps help him put some value on the stress caused by finals week. He questioned the validity of having so much importance packed into 10 days, making it possible for all the hard work he's done throughout the semester to be for naught.

Let's look at a "real world" example. In most jobs requiring a college education, you will have projects that you work on over a long stretch of time, with a very specific deadline at the end of that time. If you work on a project for two months and then don't get the project to your boss or even your boss's boss on time, or present it badly, this will have a very negative impact on your job future, regardless of how much work you put into it over two months.

The stress put on you to push yourself and endure academic hardships for 10 days at the end of each semester is one of the best training experiences you will get out of college.

Sein-off

The gang takes its place in TV lore

Adam Martignetti

Move over "M.A.S.H." Sam, Norm and the rest of the "Cheers" crew. Move over Andy Griffith, Mary Tyler Moore, Lucy and Ricky, Ed and Ralph. You're time has come and gone.

Tonight, sometime around 9:59 p.m., "Seinfeld" will assume its rightful place in television history as the best show of all-time. An entire industry, a nation and the world for that matter, will watch as NBC airs the special two-hour series finale of the ultimate show about nothing. Viewers will no doubt miss seeing Elaine's "Get out!," the K-Man's affirmative answer for everything, "Giddyup!," Jerry's "Hello Newman," and George's neurotic self-serving antics. They'll watch tonight and celebrate the show that re-defined television comedy and the way people watch it. "Seinfeld," the most successful half-hour ever to grace the small screen, leaves on its own terms — still the undisputed best comedy on television.

The self-proclaimed "show about nothing" has enchanted audiences for nine years. Why? Well, it's simple; the show is not about "nothing," but rather about life, or at least life in Jerry Seinfeld's eyes. The show has demonstrated an uncanny ability to extrapolate Jerry's quirky "did you ever notice?" style of stand-up comedy onto the set of "Seinfeld" week after week. Sure some of the situational comedy might be exaggerated, but the basis for these situations strikes such familiar tones with the audience that it makes them enormously funny. Last week's episode is the perfect example. Caught in a traffic jam, the gang finagles, hassles, maneuvers and blunders their way around, but in the end, none of them end up more than five feet from where they started.

The show seems like nothing on the surface, but the script is ingenious and extremely engaging because it's something with which the audience easily identifies. What about the "Yada, yada, yada" episode? An entire half-hour with absolutely no plot developments, no action, based on three words, yet it somehow managed to become of those transcendent moments in the show's history. The next morning, around water coolers across America, everyone was saying "Yada, yada, yada." Who could ever forget the episode in which Jerry and pals become hopelessly lost in a mall parking garage while searching for their lost car? At each different level, each section, each color, frustration grows deeper for the group as any hope disappears. Although this may appear to be a somewhat sadistic pleasure to watch, the audience has come

A few of the classics

Marty Keane

Adam Martignetti

The Pick (12/16/92, episode #51): The famed episode where Jerry gets caught by his girlfriend picking his nose, but was he really? According to Jerry, "she was in no position to make the call." Elsewhere, Kramer models underwear for Calvin Klein and Elaine's Christmas card reveals a little more than she intended — "nippular" exposure to be exact.

The Contest (11/18/92, episode #49): The simple mantra "Master of my domain" has invaded pop culture so much as to instantly legitimatize this episode as a Seinfeld classic. The gang has a contest to see who can practice sexual self- control the longest. Kramer's utterance of "I'm out!" after watching an attractive woman out Jerry's window and retiring to his apartment for a few minutes is legendary.

The Outing (2/11/93, episode #55): This is an episode that probably would not have made it on any other show — "not that there's anything wrong with that." A reporter outs Jerry and George even though they were never in. This episode demonstrates Seinfeld's ability to deftly deal with the most sensitive issues in a funny way.

The Chinese Restaurant (5/23/91, episode #15): An early classic, this episode established that "Seinfeld" could get away with devoting an entire show to one scene in a restaurant. Jerry yearns to see Plan 9 From Outer Space, Elaine's hungry and George can't use the pay phone. "Didn't those people come in after us?" Jerry utters while they wait in vain for a table. Yes, they did Jerry, but you came out ahead with this episode.

The Parking Garage (10/30/91, episode #25): Another "show about nothing" unfolds as the fabulous foursome can't find their car in a mall parking garage. Their downward spiral is an absolute pleasure to watch. And George says, "I can't carry a pen. I'm afraid I'll puncture my scrotum." Priceless.

The Junior Mint (5/18/93, episode #58): This one makes the list for the simple reason that Seinfeld credits this episode for turning the show around. His ad-lib "watch them slice this fat bastard up" introduces a new dark brooding comedy to the show. Oh yeah, there's also Jerry's girlfriend (Dolores) whose name rhymes with a female body part and Kramer, who accidentally drops a Junior Mint into Roy's vital organs.

The Marine Biologist (2/10/94, episode #75): One of those classic "Seinfeld"'s where everything ties together at the end. Kramer's golf balls call George on the bluff that he's a marine biologist, which Jerry invented in the first place.

The Soup Nazi (11/2/95, episode #110): "No soup for you. One year" pretty much sums it up. This episode shows Seinfeld's unparalleled ability to capture New York life. When Jerry leaves his girlfriend in favor of soup, we get the ultimate micro-

The bit players

Marty Keane

Newman (Wayne Knight): Jerry's arch nemesis, everyone's favorite mail carrier is akin to the anti-christ, at least in the eyes of Jerry. An enigma wrapped in a twinkie, Newman's always up to no good. He's kidnapped pets, delivered calzones, and failed to deliver what he's supposed, the mail. The exchanges between him and Jerry are simply priceless. They're like the two kids forced to like each other by their parents.

Frank & Estelle Costanza (Jerry Stiller & Estelle Harris): Easily the funniest couple on television, the Costanza's are at each others throats constantly. Not surprisingly, their personal turmoil has rubbed off on George, who trys to blame them for all his woes. Frank has uttered some especially memorable lines, including "The Serenity Now" episode (#151) earlier this season. Estelle burst onto the scene after finding her son, ahem, treating his body like an amusement park. The rest, they say, is history.

Morty & Helen Seinfeld (Barney Martin & Liz Sheridan): From their luxurious condo down in Florida, where Morty, a retired raincoat salesman who was the head of the condo association, and Helen, always lend a sympathetic ear to Jerry. They don't like the Costanza's (they even turned down Estelle's paella) and act like children. Morty and Helen are the ultimate cheapskates — they always go to dinner before 6 p.m. to get thir senior citizen discount, they agonize over petty amounts money endlessly, yada, yada, yada.

Bob Sakamano: Kramer's often referred to but never seen friend, Bob Sakamano has been the subject of many conversations, including a memorable one between Elaine and Jerry in "The Fatigues" (episode #132) in which Jerry describes a party thrown by Sakamano as "a lovely affair."

Art Vandalay: George's alter-ego. The all-purpose name he gives when he (lamely) tries to conceal his identity. Mr. Vandalay's usual occupation is either architect or

Maimed revives Hitchcock, Steve Martin in Spanish Prisoner

By Robert Roensch
Collegian Staff

THE SPANISH PRISONER
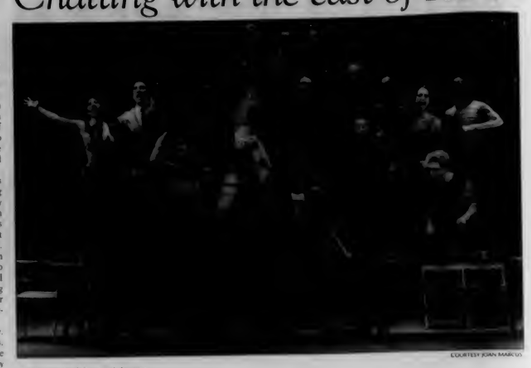
Directed by David Maimed with Campbell Scott, Rebecca Pidgeon and Steve Martin
Playing at Pleasant St. Theaters

There has been a recent upswing in puzzle thrillers, movies full of twists and double-crosses that follow in the tradition of the genre's greatest magician, Alfred Hitchcock. Recent contenders include The Usual Suspects, The Game, and this spring's Wild Things. These are smoothly made movies all, full of jaw-dropping plot leaps, but while Suspects has Kevin Spacey, The Game has the elegant menace of director David Fincher, and Wild Things has gratuitous sex scenes, none come close to matching Hitchcock's conciseness. David Maimed's The Spanish Prisoner is the latest to fall under the shadow of the master.

The plot starts simply. Company man Joe Ross invents an incredibly valuable mathematical formula known only as "The Process." It's never clear what the Process is, but that's not important. It's just the blank center of the scheming. To make a long story short, Joe runs into a mysterious businessman (Steve Martin) befriends an odd office secretary (Rebecca Pidgeon) and then his life goes to pieces. It would be wrong to say any more, except that it is all incredibly interesting, not merely amazing or shocking, but unpredictable and understandable all at once.

Maimed's direction is not harmed so much by a comparison with Hitchcock because, while Hitchcock worked most effectively with visuals, Maimed's tools are words. Not to say that The Spanish Prisoner is deficient visually, the visuals are clean and generally dark, a perfect background for the verbal fireworks, a page for the poem. Maimed writes like no one else currently working in American movies. Unlike many popular American screen writers, Maimed works not by letting loose a flood of words and cultural references, but by shaving sentences to their bare minimums. The result is not unlike dialogue spoken unconsciously in meter. It is both hard-boiled and musical.



Campbell Scott is good enough at the nice guy\James Stewart role Joe Ross, and he wisely underplays, allowing the mysterious characters surrounding him to seize and toy with our attention. Rebecca Pidgeon, Maimed's wife, is a revelation as Susan, the perky, off-kilter secretary who has a crush on Joe. Pidgeon creates one of strangest and most original characters in recent memory, a smart, sexy dork. Steve Martin is also excellent as the wealthy business man who befriends Joe for unknown reasons. It has been so long since Steve Martin has been in a real movie that I almost had to get up and give the movie screen a hug when he first came out. Simply put, Steve Martin is better than a raspberry popsicle after mowing the lawn. His performance is smooth as silk, effortless and disturbing.

It's hard to talk about this movie without giving it away. Going to the movie is like stepping into a maze of words. Clues, red herrings, and philosophical babble fly by like rifle fire, blending together. Maimed and the cast basically dare you to keep up, and, with such a suave cast and such a lean, razor-sharp script, chasing the truth is an exhilarating experience. A

After a couple of paltry efforts, Steve Martin points toward his lifting career in the powerful Spanish Prisoner.

Chatting with the cast of Rent

The cast of Rent celebrates.

CHICAGO — I sat in my cushy third row seat at Chicago's Shubert Theater, staring at the starkly decorated, graffiti-enhanced stage, nervously waiting for the lights to go down. At first glance, the fold-up chairs and fire escape that serve as the only backdrop for this Broadway musical would certainly not allude to any type of brilliance. Those who have seen the show, however, know that ornate sets and lush costuming have no place in this masterpiece called Rent.

It was my sixth time seeing the show, and normally I would be completely psyched. This time it was different. I was terrified. I knew that as soon as the show ended and the crowds filed out, my work of interviewing the cast members would begin. Sound checks echoed throughout, piquing my nervous anticipation. And so I sat. Waiting.

Moments later the stage was full, positively exploding with the voices of the most eccentric, talented ensemble of urban hipsters and angst-filled twenty-somethings one could possibly imagine. Wall-to-wall energy pounded as the cast sang its opening number, injecting the audience with its raw emotional power, breathing life into the minimalist stage.

Poised to break through the boundaries of mainstream theater, Rent is a timely drama that details the lives of a diverse group of artists in the East Village, New York City. It follows them as they deal personally with many of the pressing realities of today, showing the faces behind words like AIDS, drug addiction and poverty. They are gay, straight, bisexual, black, white, Latino and Asian. Above all, though, they are human, weaving an intricate web of anger and joy, disappointment and hope.

This theme has gained a cult-like following. Opening on Broadway, it is now touring the country. And this cast, which had just come from Boston, did not disappoint. After the performance with my faith restored in humanity and musical theater, I ventured backstage with my best friend Andrea by my side. Always the calmer one, I knew she would not let me cry, faint, or go speechless (any of which might normally be my reactions) upon meeting the cast.

A rainbow of colorful garments in the form of orange rubber skirts and metallic silver sweaters hung in the winding hallways behind the stage. Actors walked by, smiling as they belted out anything from old-school Michael Jackson to the latest Erykah Badu. They were exaggerated and playful, obviously running on the adrenaline that live performance requires.

As we rounded the last corner in this maze-like building, I heard a soft, quiet voice, barely audible beneath the screams of laughter and song that permeated the hallways. There stood Simone who plays the HIV positive, exotic dancer Mimi Marquez. She greeted us warmly and invited us into her tiny, dimly lit dressing room. Obviously exhausted, she exuded a peaceful, almost prophet-like presence. The daughter of famed 1960's singer Nina Simone, she is used to being in the spotlight.

Her love for Rent and her character are clear.

"I'm a performer to the bone. To the core. It's what I do," she told us as she sat in her blue jeans and white t-shirt, a sharp contrast from the leather and lace ensembles she struts on stage. Her briscism and sensuality in the show are quickly forgotten by the warm, low key aura she radiates as she speaks to us of her passion for the limelight and dreams of superstardom.

To Simone, the best part of her tiring job is knowing that the audience has been touched, that maybe their views were changed or their minds were opened by her performance. Her kindness and sincerity come through in her voice. Any nervousness I might have felt disappeared as she spoke to us of her career, her dreams, and aspirations.

Next I sat down with Shaun Earl,

The Rye (1/4/96, episode #115): Elaine needs to use her sponges thriftily. Kramer feeds his horse Beef-o-Reeno. The Costanzas take back their marble from Susan's parents' house. Jerry needs to mug an old lady to help George get the rye back in the house. Chaos ensues and George... gets caught. Then again, doesn't he always get caught?

The Bizarro Jerry (10/3/96, episode #129): Elaine leaves the group... finally, only to enter another idyllic version of the same thing. Her "get out!" puts her in hot water and returns her to Jerry and company as always. This episode's worth it just to see what the bizarro versions of George and Jerry's apartments look like.

The Yada Yada (4/24/97, episode #145): George loves a girl who never tells the whole story because it's "like dating USA Today." Kramer labels Jerry an "anti-dentite." The best scene though is when Jerry goes to the confessional to complain about his dentist who became a Jew just for the jokes. When he sits on the kneeler it's funny, but when George comes in at the end, it's hilarious.

Veronica Webb talks about being a model, editor

By Nekesa Mumbi Moody
Associated Press

NEW YORK — When she first started modeling more than a decade ago, Veronica Webb wasn't exactly enamored of her glamorous new profession.

"It certainly wasn't my parents' dream for me. One of my sisters is a doctor and the other is a mathematician, and I dropped out of college and became a model, which was shocking to them," Webb says. "There's no pension in that job. It doesn't give you a set of credentials that can never be taken away from you." It's a surprising statement given what Webb has achieved in the business. The striking beauty, discovered on the streets of New York by a makeup artist in the early 1980s, was the first black model to receive an exclusive contract from a major cosmetics company.

But early on in her career, modeling didn't give her enough satisfaction. Seeking validation, she forged ahead with other interests, working as a journalist and landing small roles in movies such as "Jungle Fever."

She's enjoyed success in all her endeavors.

Webb, 33, is editor-at-large at Interview magazine, and Miramax Books has just published "Veronica Webb Sight: Adventures in the Big City," a reflection of her life and a collection of her essays. She's also written a screenplay that is being developed into a movie.

Her acting career has also continued to gather steam. She has a recurring role in the new Fox sitcom "Damon," starring Damon Wayans.

End of the semester celebration featuring a capella: Meanwhile

By Emily Trask
Collegian Staff

To celebrate the end of the semester, on Friday, May 15, the all-female a capella group Meanwhile will put on a concert in the Fine Arts Center, in Bezanson Recital Hall.

The group is composed of seven UMass undergraduate women. And despite what you might think the members of Meanwhile are not all music majors, they range from Spanish, English to elementary education.

Meanwhile was started two years ago by music major Naomi Lopin in response to the popularity of the all male a capella group The Doo-Wop Shop.

Lopin explains her desire to start Meanwhile, "The [Doo- Wop] Shop had such a good following. I thought, why can't there be a female group too?" So Lopin gathered together women she knew who loved music to form Meanwhile.

Three of the group's original members have remained with the group: Naomi Lopin, Jen Moss and Mary Welch.

This past September they held tryouts for two more members and gained Alexis Wiggins and Sarah Fix, and most recently the group added two more newcomers: Anne Sheridan and Abby Farricker.

Meanwhile performs everything from the Beatles to Aretha Franklin to Joni Mitchell, as well as a popular arrangement of Ani DiFranco's "32 Flavors."

The group arranges all of their own pieces by listening to songs and figuring out the individual parts. A typical arrangement consists of the lead, the backup, bass and percussion. All the members of "Meanwhile" take turns with the different parts for the arrangements. Meanwhile member Mary Welch joking about the variety of their arrangement and their voices said, "on some songs I'm a soprano, and on others I'm a bass."

Meanwhile has performed throughout the entire year in such venues as the Bluewall, Mahar Auditorium, Greenough basement, the Campus Center and various off-campus locations, including a local middle school.

Meanwhile will be performing at this year's Commencement Ball with the Doo Wop Shop on May 22, as well as Friday the 15th.

This Friday's performance will be at 7:30. It will also be free of charge.

What to watch during the summer

The television season is over, so there is nothing to watch right? If you're anything like me (and chances are you're not because I watch more TV in a day than most people watch in a week), the end of the regular televislon season means nothing more than a desperate search for something new to watch because all of the quality programs have gone into re-runt.

It's true, there's no more "Seinfeld" (ever) or "Party of Five," and we're going to have to wait more than three months to see if Ross (David Schwimmer) can make up for his disastrous blunder at his wedding on "Friends," but trust me, as an expert on watching nothing, I can tell you that there's something for everyone on television to watch in the tube's official off-season.

Have you ever sat down and watched something completely useless and void of all educational and entertainment value? If you said no, you would obviously be lying. We have all watched something on televlsion that we're not proud of. Personally, I tend to be extremely partial to those awful infomercialsls that make a lousy attempt to sell me something that I clearly could never use. The worst aspect of watching these things has to be the feeling that I get when I'm sitting in front of my televisiion at 5 a.m. fighting off my urge to give into Dionne Warwick's persuasive attempts to force me to call her Psychic Friends while discovering the sad realization that I have no life!

Let's face it, you're not going to find Leonardo DiCaprio selling hemorrhoid cream or Sandra Bullock advising you to buy the hit death metal records of the '80s. No, all of the actors (or sad attempts at trying to be an actor) who star in these low paying roles are people that have been completely rejected from the entertainment world. Unless you consider Sally Struthers one of the elite among Hollywood, she's just further proof that the advertisers are searching the dregs of celebrities for someone to push their terrible products.

So if infomercials are clearly not the answer to the TV drought, then what will fulfill our need for quality entertainment? Could it possibly be the dreaded reruns? Reruns could mean more than one thing. They could mean the returns of the shows in their normal time slots, or they could possibly mean syndication. There's nothing at all wrong with watching syndicated episodes of your favorite shows. I had to stop taping the reruns of "The Simpsons" because it became evident that I would not leave my house. Syndicated episodes of many shows give us a chance to see the moments that we love over and over again. The problem is that after a while, all of the episodes have been shown, and it gets boring. However, during the summer there are so many different shows to watch, and the chances of seeing them all are very slim (once again, unless you're me who watches more than 24 hours of TV a day). Syndication is a good way to see some of the episodes that you may have missed when they were aired, and a chance to watch the events you remember from TV past.

Finally, if prime time roles around and you're looking for something to watch, here's a list of shows that you may not have paid much attention to during the TV season this year that are definitely worth a watch.

Monday night brings us ABC's "The Practice." Personally, I find it difficult to get into, and some of it can be tough to follow without knowing the basic story line of the show. Also on Monday night is Fox's "Ally McBeal." This show started to pick up a strong following near the end of the season, but the summer is a perfect time to see the early episodes that you may have missed.

This was a decent year for "Home Improvement." Some of the episodes were quite good at dealing with issues that trouble society. An especially good episode this season dealt with teens and drugs. Keep an eye on the TV guide for a chance to catch this episode.

While you were watching "Beverly Hills 90210," "Party of Five" and "South Park" this year, you were missing out on some great TV. I cannot stop encouraging people to watch ABC's terrific sitcom "Spin City." Michael J. Fox does an excellent job in the lead role that last year earned him a Best Actor in a Comedy nomination at the Emmy Awards. He still deserves that nomination, and will no doubt get a nod again this year. Also on ABC is "The Drew Carey Show." an excellent comedy and well worth a peek. On Thursday nights, NBC shows "Just Shoot Me." The show is most likely to take over "Seinfeld" at 9 p.m.

Fridays bring us "Boy Meets World," "Sabrina the Teenage Witch" and "20/20." all on ABC.

Finally, here's a great story to leave you with for the summer. Jerry Springer can book himself as a guest. He was caught on tape in a hotel room in England having sex with one of his past guests. To make the story more interesting, it happened to be the guest that he invited on the show to brag about her breaking the world sex record by being with 350 men in one day.

The icing on the cake? Springer then went on to have sex with the woman's step-mother. I'd like to hear what Jerry's final thought is on this little mishap.

Have a great summer, and tune in next year to find out the truth about my huge cliffhanger ending of this column.

who plays the sweet and playful drag queen, "Angel," in the show. I recognize him immediately from his lead role in the 1980's musical, Fame. Angel (whose costume of body glitter, fake eyelashes and platform shoes) is an audience favorite and Shaun proves to be equally charming in real life.

Laughter is a running theme throughout our conversation as he tells us stories of his childhood and how he was made to perform at family gatherings. He is comedic. He is attentive. He listens. And he's fun to look at, owning the refined face and carefully sculpted body of a veteran actor.

When asked of the show's message, he stresses acceptance. — "I think that the point of Rent is not to judge, but rather to love" — compassion and living each day as if it were your last.

"To me, theater is like a ministry. It is a gift. And we just keep repeating 'No day but today,'" Earl said.

I asked with a straight face what he enjoys most about his job. He paused momentarily (for dramatic effect), and a huge smile spread across his face.

"Wearing dresses!" he said, adding seriously, "Can you imagine?" I laughed hysterically now at the surprising admission and he continued, "The big shoes. Being pretty!" He cracked himself up as well, clearly aware of his ability to entertain.

I then spoke with Christian Anderson, who plays the vulnerable, introspective frontman "Mark Cohen" in the show. A Northampton native, he was excited to hear that I was from UMass. He expressed how accurate he feels Rent is, having lived in the East Village himself as a struggling actor prior to his audition for the show.

"I wouldn't look at anything in the show and say, 'No way, that's ridiculous,' or, 'That would never happen', which I think makes it so powerful."

Like his character, Christian is humble and sincere. He has achieved something which could be considered a feat for an actor who has performed on Broadway (trading places with Anthony Rapp, the original Mark Cohen). That is, he is completely real and without pretension, following in the footsteps of his fellow cast members Simone and Earl. His voice and disposition is much like his on-stage presence, which is comforting, allowing the atmosphere to feel relaxed.

My interviewing time slot had long since passed, but Christian did not seem concerned. He was ready for his second performance of the night, and in his modest nature, he seemed flattered that I wanted to speak with him.

As I left the theater, I was overwhelmed by a feeling of hope. These people are the genuine article, just as the New York City inhabitants they represent. They proved to me, in the course of an hour or so, that they truly believe in the messages they shout each night on-stage.

Rent is currently playing at the Bushnell Theater in Hartford.

SPORTS

Here in the Sports Department we cover a wide range of occurrences in the world of sports. Obviously, the main purpose of the page is to cover UMass sports, but we also run weekly columns on pro baseball, the NFL, NHL, NBA, and college football and basketball. In addition, we also run a weekly "Around the Horn" column, which allows any writer to take a crack at giving their viewpoint on the weeks sporting events.

Another plus in the Sports Department is the opportunity for travel. Just to name a few sites, UMass teams will play in Colorado, Michigan, and Hawaii this year. Last year writers travelled to Boyertown, Penn. for the Atlantic 10 baseball tournament and to Fenway Park for the baseball Beanpot, as well as various other locations.

If you want to write for the Sports Department, just stop down to 113 Campus Center, and ask for Michael Kobylanski. You can also reach me by phone at 545–1749, or by e-mail at kobo3@hotmail.com.

Then come down and writeI Ed/Op writers have the ability to share their opinions with the whole campus, to anger the administration, or to tick off the SGA. For next semester, we are hoping to have a core group of writers who are eager, well-informed and articulate. If you're interested, come on down to the Collegian , ask for Mike Messaros. Or if you're a scaredy-cat, just give a call at 545–1491.

Technicians are responsible for developing black and white negatives, laying out photos for news and scanning negatives in photoshop. Knowledge of photoshop and layout is recommended but not required.

to know these characters and their idiosyncrasies so well that their plummet into despair is a visual masterpiece. We relish Kramer's absentmindedness and watching him lug around a TV in search of the car. We love Elaine's desperate pleas to save her dying goldfish, George's frantic, neurotic attempts to make his parents' anniversary party on time and Jerry's dilemma — whether or not to hold it in.

After all, the show's appeal undoubtedly lies in the four characters and watching their humorous exploits each week. Here's my take on the four characters that lit up television primetime for nine years.

• Kramer: Jerry's wacky next door neighbor, whose zany entrances and overt willingness to borrow anything that belongs to Jerry give him an enormous magnetic appeal. Kramer always has some half–brained scheme to make money, yet he never holds any jobs for the entire nine years of the show. I think perhaps George Costanza captured Kramer best here: "Kramer goes to a fantasy camp? His whole life is a fantasy camp. People should plunk down two thousand dollars to live like him for a week. Do nothing, fall ass–backwards into money, mooch food off your neighbors, and have sex without dating. That's a fantasy camp!"

• George: George Costanza is a balding middle–aged man who is not only neurotic but also paranoid. Life plots against him — especially the constant nagging of his parents — wears him down and frustrates him almost to the point of insanity. Essentially, George wants the world and all that's in it, but he is completely inept and has none of the skills required to obtain this goal. His one saving grace is that he realizes this ineptitude and can respond to it with comedy.

• Elaine: The lone female in the group and, as George is quick to point out, "She doesn't have any female friends." Ironically, the group probably looks down upon Elaine a bit because she is the only one among them who steadily holds a normal job. Why? Her bosses are always bizarre lunatics at best. Elaine constantly searches for the one thing, which none of them can find — love. Unconsciously, she ruins every relationship she's ever in, always bringing her back to the group in frustration, and, recently, Puddy. During last week's episode, Elaine complained "I've been trying to get out of this group for ten years." Sorry, Lainy, but you've only got one episode left, and I don't think you're going to make it.

• Jerry: Everything about Jerry Seinfeld points to a certain smug, childish wit that he carries about himself. Of course, he's a comedian, which everyone knows is not really a job, but just a simple extension of his everyday life. His infatuation with cereal, Lois Lane, and super heroes all point to this sophisticated immaturity, which makes Jerry extremely charming and absorbing. Jerry realizes the utter chaos and total silliness about him and he resigns himself to it. Jerry relishes this small world, his world, where he's free to make any sarcastic piercing comments about the incongruities about him.

A long time ago, my friend and I theorized why four people, who can't hold a steady job or any real job (comedian doesn't count, sorry Jerry), who can't attach themselves to anyone outside the group, who sit around a coffee shop or Jerry's apartment talking about how pathetic their lives are, could ever be the most popular and certainly the most recognizable characters on TV. We came up with one answer, which I believe still holds true to this day — apathy. That's right apathy — the characters' complete indifference to the world and the events around them. Is anything funnier than when Jerry snidely remarks "That's a shame" after someone else's misfortune? After George's fiancee Susan dies, not even George shows the least bit of concern. Their reaction, "So, she's dead? Yeah. Huh. Well, you guys wanna go get some coffee?" is typical Seinfeldian cruelty perhaps, but hilarious definitely. I think that in some small way each of us wishes that we could be that imperturbable, that indifferent to the world around us. We wish that we could find humor in everything no matter how bleak or how boring it may be. If Seinfeld taught us anything over the years, which i know it did not teach us intentionally, then it probably taught us that there is humor in just about every situational It's just a matter of finding that humor and laughing about it.

That said, there's nothing left to do, but sit back and enjoy the final episode of a truly great show. I'm sure Seinfeld will live on for many years in syndication: we'll probably even get to see the last season repeated over the summer, but Thursday night will be really special as Seinfeld shows us its magic one last time. When the last five minutes come around, what happens then? Cry? Well, I might shed a tear, but that's not what Jerry, Elaine, George, or Kramer would do. No, they would be laughing, and I'm sure the audience will be also, to the very end because that's the show, that's Seinfeld. Then, after it's all over, the four of them would probably go to the coffee shop one last time.

J. Peterman (John O'Hurley): The cranially–challenged head of the catalog that bears his name, Peterman is prone to fly off the handle at any time and indulge his eccentric impulses. Trips to Burma — which you may know as Myanmar — and his penchant for spending obscene amounts of money at auctions on decades–old birthday cake (episode #166) and JFK's golf clubs (episode #124) bear this out.

Kenny Bania (Stephen Hytner): A competing comedian, Bania will be forever known as the guy who, upon giving Jerry a brand new Armani suit, demanded dinner at Mendi's. He's also given us the memorable line "That's gold Jerry, gold!" But it's his ability, like Newman, to get under Jerry's skin that has provided such continuous hilarity. You've got to love a guy who does a twelve–minute bit on Ovaltine.

Uncle Leo (Len Lesser): Another of Jerry's quirky relatives, Uncle Leo seems to be losing it as of late. I mean, the guy opened up a mail bomb and burnt off his eyebrows. On top of that, he screwed Jerry's mom out of $50. Do you know how much that comes out to with interest figured in over all the years? Pettiness has never been so divine.

Mr. Pitt (Ian Abercrombie): Elaine's boss for a time, Mr. Pitt was a petulant fellow. He was an upper–crust Brit all the way, but still found it in his heart to eat Snickers, albeit with a fork, and have a soft spot for Woody Woodpecker. Seeing him demand that Elaine win a radio contest so he could win a spot holding Woody's reins in the Thanksgiving Day Parade was a hoot.

David Puddy (Patrick Warburton): The off–on–off–on–off– on boyfriend of Elaine, Puddy first came to prominence when he stole Jerry's "move" and used on Elaine. He's really come into his own this season, turning up more regularly, wearing furs, 8–ball jackets, selling cars, and generally acting like a ten–year old.

Mickey (Danny Woodburn): Kramer's pint–sized buddy, Mickey is perhaps best known for being a stand–in on soap's for child actors. A little moody, though.

Susan Biddle Ross (Heidi Swedberg): If "Seinfeld" had a tragic hero, George's fiancee, Susan, is it. The fate that befell her is one only George would wish on someone — she died licking cheap glue on her wedding invitations in the show's darkest episode (#126). On the upside, she's a martyr for every poor sap who's trapped in a miserable relationship. Long live her memory.

Sue Ellen Mischke (Brenda Strong): She braless O'Henry candy heiress, she used to be friends with Elaine until this season's famous backward episode, "The Betrayal" (episode #156). In it, we are told of Elaine's fling with her soon–to– be husband Pinter.

bunch, but I have faith in our rookie class.

I will always remember the ride to Hofstra with Mr. Baker. Watch out for those Hofstralians, they are VERY serious! I never knew Bakes could be so damn funny.

Lastly, but certainly not least, shout outs and thanks to Big Dugga, Sunshine, the Jill–Na–Na, and the rest of my crew. Hey, did you know Amanda Gorman was at Rafters? Look out babe, you're famous now!

Jorma Kansanen — Its hard to imagine that four years (yes, four years) down in this Hole Otherwise Known As The Collegian is over. Hey. I kid because I care.

There were many things that brought a "tear to me aye, laddy" in this final semester of semesters, so let's go with the Big Three, so to say. The first memory is not a night, a day or two days and nights. It is four days and four nights.

The NCAA Tournament in Atlanta was a misty–eyed experience — drinking beers with Dookie while watching the sunset over Atlanta from Room 4029 in the Grand Marquis (media hospitality is a wonderful thing); the breakfast spread in said Room 4029, supposedly snubbing UCLA coach Steve Lavin in the media hospitality room in the Georgia Dome, having Lavin predict the winning set play to me "before" Cincinnati defeated Northern Arizona, watching CP and Dookie nearly sh*t their pants when a bum hassled them uptown, and two more things, Ashley Judd and Buckhead (i.e. three blocks of sheer decadence).

Damn, can't forget the shout–out to South Carolina state trooper J.R. Leblanc. Thanks for the speeding tips, dude.

Two, shooting photo at Senior Day for the softball team. That tore at some serious heart strings, and I had to compose myself for a minute. Geez, I can't help but get wrapped up in a team that my housemate talks about every second of the freakin' day (hey, he's not a groupie, but he aspires to be one). And, uh, Harry is good. Right, Jackie?

But lastly, I have to go with the team that I've covered in one capacity or another for four years — women's lacrosse. Senior Day was an emotional one as well, and "that" loss to BU seemed to end their careers. But, good things happen to great people in the dimmest of hours, and Jen Bowen, Jen Herker and Amy Leder got their first taste of the postseason with their ECAC Tournament bid.

Those three have gone through some serious sh*t the past four years, and nothing better could have happened to them.

Congrats, ladies. You deserved it.

Corey Peter Goodman — "I'm gonna bust you upside your head." Cue the laughter, Luke and Jorma just so no one is in the dark, this is what some guy from Syracuse said to me in Atlanta after I told him I didn't have any money to spare. Sad, I know, but this is what I think of when I think of this semester. And people wonder why I hate the Orangemen so.

But this was just a small blemish on what was a fun time traveling with UMass basketball, and Jorma and Luke. The one memory I'll be able to share with my children was getting to walk behind Hollywood's own Ashley Judd on my way to the Georgia Dome urinals (very clean, by the way.) She was wearing very tight spandex and an even tighter Kentucky t–shirt, and guys, at least a C cup.

Jorma, you are the most subtly, hilarious guy I've ever known. Remember how we lost it In the Sports Bar when you were talking about a certain reporter, and a certain deformity. And yes, the Stanford mascot is the Cardinal Fir. Hey, and I'm sorry for asking which penitentiary your friends were in. GOOD–man, it was uncalled for.

Luke. You swim. I swim. We all swim. I thought you were kind–of a loser before the semester started, but you're alright, I guess. Is that a compliment, or what? Just do us a favor and pull over and let me drive, me and Casey are getting sick in the back seat.

Finally, I want to thank and say good–bye to my boys, the real friends. The ones I've known since I came to UMass, and who are graduating now. You know who you are: Tony, Shane, Liese, Rich, even Bob. MVC represent.

The Front Office

Jamie Jee — "Enlighten your life," reads the back of the 30th anniversary Collegian shirts. "Read the Collegian."

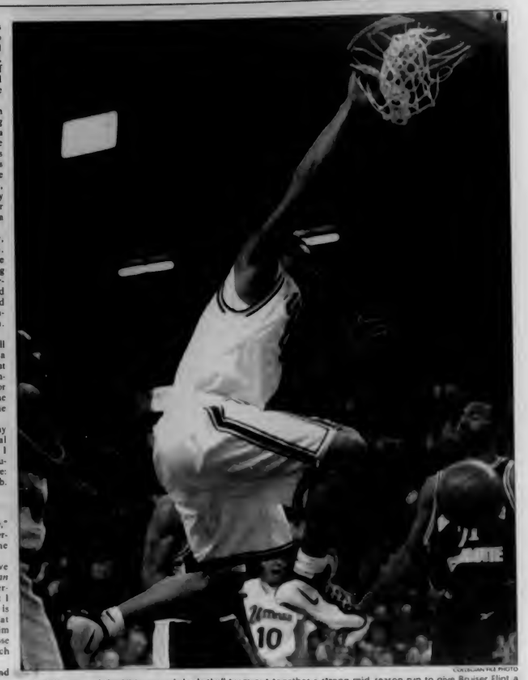
Now, whether or not you have been "enlightened" by the Collegian this year is something best determined on your own terms. What I can say, however, is that writing is not too shabby. I also doubt that working with an undefeated swim team and a spirited women's lacrosse contingent could have gone much better.

Hopefully you've enjoyed and appreciated the news (or the crossword) in this year's pages as much as I've enjoyed and appreciated my fellow writers. While I have spent much of my time alongside various sportswriters, my freshman experience has fortunately been extended beyond the realm of homeruns, touchdowns and... groundballs (the lacrosse type).

Did that extension bring me closer to a state of "enlightenment?" I suppose that's open to debate but let's see. There was Chris Stamm leading the charge, Marty Keane's Chicago–based humor, Brian McDermott's photo suggestions, John Burke's photo acceptance and the [illegible] crew's assistance. Listening to Bob Ryan with the basketball beat boys (Luke Meredith and Fred Hurlbrink). Casey Kane's dictation. Breat Mauser's mouth (and his shadow — Ken McDonald). Mike Kobylanski's hugeness. Who could forget Jill Carroll's courageous coverage of the SGA?

I appreciated the camaraderie of the entire Collegian staff this past semester and the satisfaction of knowing that even the 52nd coolest kid can get a taste of a form of "enlightenment."

Michael Kobylanski — Well, I haven't even been here 32 months, and I'm already the boss. So what does that mean for 1998–99?



First off, there will be mad road trips, especially for all of those that I got snubbed on this year (i.e. Boyertown, Philly, Durham, N.H.). Since I am the boss next year, I will be going away. Maybe I'll get the rest of the staff in on the action too. Maybe.

Jorma, thanks for taking me to the finest Hockey East towns in New England, even if we spent most of our time at that McDonald's in Ayer. And thanks for graduating so that I can cover the women's soccer beat. The fun that I'm going to have...

C.P., you make a good umpire. Thanks for moving up to men's hoop so that I could cover hockey. Jorma and I still think you were a jinx.

Luke, thanks for getting me started down here and moving me up through the ranks so quick. I'm sure that you enjoyed watching me at the Collegian party, and thanks for all of the encouragement.

Good luck, guys, in whatever you choose to do.

To Ralls (a.k.a. Ms. All–State field hockey), I know that you're not graduating, but here's something for you. Ironically, I am a K.C. obsessor, but not the one that you're referring too.

Have fun at USC. You can hang out with Mushie's cousin. See you in the fall of '99.

By the way, Connecticut rules, even if I do go to school at UMass.

Kathleen Ralls — After a one–year tenure as a sports associate and playing a minor role on the Ed\Op section as "Big Red," I am ready to take my two–years–in–the–making UMass attitude to the University of South Carolina for a little "domestic exchange." Before I go, I'd just like to remind of few down here what they have meant to me.

Kobo: "the Connecticut Cult Victim," and K.C. obsessor. I'm sure nobody will miss our constant bickering in the press box next year. CT does not rule the baseball team! Don't forget, I have College of Charleston. Good Luck next year!

Casey: or "Mrs. V." "You live in Palm Manor..." Thanks for the good advice with my issues. You'd better lead a winning intramural field hockey team next year, the Sweet South Carolinas! Stamm: Thanks for the encouragement with faxing! You haven't heard the last of me!

Brian McD.: We talked mean trash at Fenway for the Beanpot. Place & Mike Corey: Women's NCAA basketball tournament In exciting IOWA. I learned that Perkins, and fine food and service, don't go hand in hand! Jackie: A courtside view of the women's basketball A–10 final, nuthin' could be finer! Someday we'll get our cookies!

Luke: Finally, mid–sized Red! Imagine if you had started tennis earlier — maybe you'd have some cool–kid HS stories to share! We'll hit some JT this summer and I'll kill you in hoops. Good luck Jorma, Corey and Marty. Court, Deb, Diane, & Lauren — together again — September 1999! Have a Coke and a smile!

JORMA KANSANEN / COLLEGIAN

The Massachusetts women's gymnastics team was one of the most successful athletic programs on campus this winter.

The Big Boss

Casey Kane — I will try to refrain from getting mushy and sentimental, but don't bank on it. Three years at UMass and I still have yet to spend a nice afternoon outside by the pond or the... What else is out there? We don't have windows in here.

Over the past semester I have seen Touchdown Jesus, Kerry Wood pitch his first at Wrigley Field, an Atlanta sunset, Place almost kill me by going through a red light in Baltimore, Nomar up close (at least as close as the first row in the rain can get me) and a mention in Chris Conner's last column (you figure out which one).

Some very due thank you's.

To Scott McConnell, Kathy Conners, Mike McComiskey, Ruthie Drew and the rest of media relations (especially the absolutely unforgettable Leigh Torbin, whom I will always love) and Bill Stickland, thank you for all your help. We would be here without you, but the sports page would be blank.

To all of the coaches, athletes (varsity and non–varsity) and sports fans, thank you for making the UMass sports community such an exciting one to be a part of. Thanks especially to Tyrone Weeks for writing the first–ever athlete's perspective column for the hoop tourney preview.

To Lorraine and Ken for complaining with me, well, you know when. To Leigh (and Lorraine) for letting me babble about him and him and him (I mean Matty!). Jill: you're going to be great next year. Marty: I will miss both your Scott Harshbarger and Harry Caray imitations.

Luke and Jorma: We have had our differences. There is no debating that fact. But this place won't be the same without you. Good luck in whatever the future holds for you. Just promise that if you guys and Corey and I ever go anywhere together, Goodman and I get to drive.

Corey: Uptown, baby. Uptown, baby. Place and Brett: The Carrier Dome has never known such talent as our display there. Maybe if we pole vaulted or boosted Jared up we could've gotten in the stadium. Saykin: I loved your flying frisbee leaps, acrobatic as they were. And the fact that you're almost as unpure as me! Can't wait till next season, as long as Patti will breaks out the long coat. And tell Dan I'm never drinking with him again.

Paul: Wait, you know a girl with a beard and three ears? Forget about Sulzner, stay with Simurda (he's the bomb). House of Commons, how ya doing? Remember, your first priority is the shirt. Jacks: Um, so I told Wes you got a concussion. That should buy you some time. Hoop was fun, remember when I had to fix Bakes' glasses before UConn?

Jee: You can be one sarcastic son of a gun, I like that! Kobo: No matter what you or Bob DeMayo say, I'm rooting for the Rams! Good luck next year, kid. You're gonna do great. Ralls: "You live in a bungalow..." and you're only 13???? Fax that! I hope South Carolina realizes how lucky it is to have you around for a year. I'll save you a shirt when we win field hockey.

And the last few. Laura: Good luck in law school, McStock. Stamm: I love you like a brother. You and I grew up a whole lot together. I will forever be proud to say that I had the pleasure and honor of working with you. Thanks. Matty: L2U.com, and all that jazz. Thank you.

Club lacrosse wraps up season

The UMass club lacrosse team wrapped up its season with a pair of wins over Williams and the University of New Haven. Rookie Chris Murray pocketed the first goal of his collegiate career against New Haven.

The team finished the year with several solid wins (Army and Williams), a few tough losses (SUNY–Farmingdale, Harvard and Navy) and strong efforts against Bridgton and 1997 champion Princeton.

Against Bridgton, UMass kept the score close until halftime, when Bridgton went to an inverted offense. Two days later, UMass played well against Princeton's inside cutting and forced the Tigers to rely on their outside shooting to score.

UMass held its annual awards night on May 6. Brendan Keenan was named as the team's Most Valuable Player, while captain Tim Mooney was praised for his team leadership. The team also said good–bye to its seniors: goaltender Mike Nowlan; scoring power Levence Eustay; and Gabe Martz, who will attend medical school next year.

The fall season for the UMass club lacrosse team will begin on Sept. 14. For more information about the team, contact coach Judy Dietel at 545–3815. – Casey Kane

We've got some of the BEST jobs on campus!

The Collegian is Hiring from now 'till the end of the semester for Fall '98. Visit our friendly offices conveniently located in the Campus Center. We're room 113 in the lower level, down the escalators, on the opposite end from the Fine Arts Cinema. Stop by to pick up an application or talk with us to... For general questions call 545-3500

NEWS

What do burning buildings, famous speakers, government scandal, peeping toms and the best resume builder on campus have in common? The News Department of the Collegian!

As a news associate or news correspondent you will be covering the latest issues and events on campus. We have beats where you can gain experience covering everything from the latest crimes to the biggest names that come to campus.

If you want to be a competitive candidate for internships and jobs, nothing on campus will give you hands-on experience like working for the Collegian News Department. Nothing will give employers a better sample of your writing than news articles. So come down to the Collegian and ask for Jill Carroll or call the News Desk at 545-1762.

SPORTS

Here in the Sports Department we cover a wide range of occurrences in the world of sports. Obviously, the main purpose of the page is to cover UMass sports, but we also run weekly columns on pro baseball, the NFL, NHL, NBA, and college football and basketball. In addition, we also run a weekly "Around the Horn" column, which allows any writer to take a crack at giving their viewpoint on the weeks sporting events.

Another plus in the Sports Department is the opportunity for travel. Just to name a few sites, UMass teams will play in Colorado, Michigan, and Hawaii this year. Last year writers travelled to Boyertown, Penn. for the Atlantic 10 baseball tournament and to Fenway Park for the baseball Beanpot, as well as various other locations.

If you want to write for the Sports Department, just stop down to 113 Campus Center, and ask for Michael Kobylanski. You can also reach me by phone at 545-1749, or by e-mail at kobo3@hotmail.com.

EDITORIAL/ OPINION

Editorial writers are the glitterati of the newsroom. Columnists are the closest thing to celebrity that you will find on the UMass campus.

Are you sick of blathering on about your opinions to random people, or keeping your feelings bottled up inside until they become bitter pills of rage? Then come down and write! Ed/Op writers have the ability to share their opinions with the whole campus, to anger the administration, or to tick off the SGA. For next semester, we are hoping to have a core group of writers who are eager, well-informed and articulate. If you're interested, come on down to the Collegian , ask for Mike Messaros. Or if you're a scaredy-cat, just give a call at 545-1491.

DIVERSITY

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian invites and encourages all to contribute to its diversity pages.

These pages, which include the Black Affairs page, the Multicultural Affairs page, the Women's Issues page, the Jewish Affairs page, the GLBT (Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual and Transgender) Issues page, and the Developing Nations page, present an opportunity for those who may not be extensively represented or covered in the regular pages of the Collegian.

The diversity desks present a forum where students may voice their opinions concerning issues which are relevant to them.

If you want to get involved in news reporting or writing, please come down and fill out an application.

If you are tired of not being heard, call Senior Diversity Editor Edgar Barros at 545-1851 or send email to ebarros@student.umass.edu.

ARTS AND LIVING

From reviewing the latest Dave Matthews Band album to interviews with Wycleffe Jean, Arts & Living is the place to be. We're currently looking for new writers to cover music, theater, film, TV, fashion and more down at the Collegian. This past year, we've given our thoughts on the Grammies, the Oscars, concerts in Northampton and productions at Bowker. The great thing about Arts & Living is that no experience is necessary —all you need are good writing skills and a love for all forms of entertainment. In addition to new writers, we're also hiring a music associate, fine arts associate and film associate for next semester. Applications are due May 8 and can be obtained down at the Collegian, or ask for Bryan at 545–1361.

COPY EDITING

The Collegian is also looking for interested students to work one night per week as copy and night editors. Requirements for both positions include excellent spelling, grammar and communication skills.

Copy editors should be Collegian staff members, have some editing experience and knowledge of Associated Press style. They are responsible for writing accurate headlines for all news stories as well as reading through all stories for accuracy and consistency.

Anyone interested in either of these positions should visit the Collegian office in the 113 Campus Center and speak with Victoria Groves or call 545–1809.

PHOTO

The Photo Department is looking for creative photographers with at least one year experience for technician and staff positions. Photographers should have their own SLR camera. Technicians are responsible for developing black and white negatives, laying out photos for news and scanning negatives in photoshop. Knowledge of photoshop and layout is recommended but not required.

Photographers interact with all departments at the Collegian as well as members of the Five College Area, so good communication skills are a must. The photo department covers all five college events, and UMass sports and area music concerts. This year photographers covered speakers such as Ray Bradbury and Coretta Scott–King in addition to events such as the NCAA Basketball Tournament and Elton John and Wyclef Jean shows. As regionals start, softball's Buckley back in game

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

On March 14, senior catcher Kelly Buckley of the No. 21 Massachusetts softball team was on top of the world.

After making the switch from shortstop to catcher in her sophomore year, the psychological wheel of position transition began to fully turn in her direction. Calling her own games, while perfectly framing borderline strikes for the plate umpire, combined with her lethal bat to create a Pudge Rodriguez–esque type of catcher, Buckley was beginning to feel that proverbial flow.

However, in the top of the third inning in that game against Louisiana State, a collision at the plate initiated a series of events that would test the Horseheads, N.Y. native. A ligament in Buckley's left thumb popped, but more importantly, she held onto the ball.

"I got the throw from Mandy [Galas], and when I tagged her she somehow jammed my thumb," Buckley said. "But, she was out. I held onto the ball, ended the inning and then it began to hurt."

With the immediate medical attention from trainer Matt DiBartolomeo, Buckley found herself not only tied to the bench for the game, but for the next month of her senior season — an important season, to say the least.

With her thumb elevated by means of tying her arm to the pole in the Florida State dugout, the senior watched her teammates celebrate the game–winning run in the bottom of the third. As freshman Debbie Tomoguchi crossed the plate on the triple from Galas, Buckley began the span of nine games with that same view — from the bench.

Being a senior, this final season in a Minutewoman uniform is undoubtedly an important one. At this stage of life, four years of hard work and dedication can almost be considered an eternity.

Yet, for her, Liz Wagner and co-captains Kim Gutridge and Tracy Osier, the possible return trip to the Women's College World Series in Oklahoma City begins this weekend with the NCAA Regional held at Totman Field. At that time, the thought of missing tomorrow's matchup with Big East champion Boston College (1 p.m.) was a frustrating one, but Buckley chose to use that time on the bench wisely.

"It was very, frustrating," Buckley said. "You see, down in Florida it felt like I was having the tournament of my life. I was calling the game, and I felt in the game more than ever. I was taking charge, and I was so confident. When this happened, I was like, 'are you kidding me? Why now?'

"It was very frustrating, but I learned a lot when I sat out. I watched, helped out and that's why when I came back I did so well at the plate. I was more focused, and being out helped me pick up a lot more of the little things. It's a different view when you sit there and watch."

Sitting and watching ended sooner than she thought, and while she was not able to handle the bottled smoke junior Danielle Henderson thrown her way, Buckley was able to step up to the plate. With a reconfigured batting grip, the senior "designated player" returned to the lineup on April 11 against Rhode Island, and went on a tear.

Since her return, Buckley has hit .448 with 18 RBI in 23 games, and has posted a .603 slugging percentage. Highlights during that span included a 5–for–7 performance on Senior Day against Temple, and an All–Tournament selection at the A–10 Championships in Kingston, R.I., but the true highlight came last weekend in the NCAA Play–In series at Hofstra.

Buckley made her return behind the plate — an appropriate occurrence to an inappropriate March 11 mishap. She was one of the keys in the two–game sweep of the No. 2 ranked team in the Northeast Region, and now, the Tournament, with the golden ticket to the WCWS for this weekend's winner, has returned to Amherst once again.

"[The layoff] made her a student of the game," Sortino said. "Her stats are incredible, but truthfully, she's a great catcher. She frames pitches, she blocks the ball, she's experienced and the team rallies around her. Obviously, we're a better team with her than without her."

A cheesy soap opera writer could not have come up with a better return for Buckley.

"It felt great," Buckley said. "I wasn't worried, or nervous, because I was practicing all week. So, I was ready, and I felt confident. Just as much as I did when I last played. It was great. Everybody supported me, and I tried to back them back as well, take charge and lead them like I'm supposed to.

"We're ready [for the Tournament]. It's been building up since the beginning of the year, and we've grown this season with little steps at a time. We're right where we want to be."

Like any caring mother–type of persona, Sortino could not thank the return of Buckley without also crediting her backup — sophomore Nikki Faessler. Faessler stepped into a difficult situation as a unexperienced catcher for a pitching staff that rates as one of the best in the nation.

Now, the duo forms a potent defensive and offensive combination. Faessler was no slouch behind the plate, but her true power is at the plate, leading the team with five home runs and 15 RBI to her credit.

"It was great to have her back, and Buck offered leadership in a very difficult play–in situation," Sortino said. "But, I have to say, we wouldn't be where we are right now without Nikki Faessler. She has done an extraordinary job, and she is enough of a team player to step to the side, and let a senior step back into the action. The great thing now is that we have Buck back, and Nikki right next to her, instead of behind her.

With a vital senior component back behind the plate, Sortino feels that her team has the potential to keep climbing the ladder to the WCWS.

"We're still climbing as a team," Sortino said. "Playing Boston College is our primary attention right now, and we just need to keep doing what we've been doing the past few months. Our goal is always to improve and get better each day, each practice and each week.

"This team has done that, and we've grown from last week's games against Hofstra. That's all you can ask."

Misty–eyed Collegian memories from the semester past

What do you get when you mix about 20 overworked, underpaid reporters, a frenzied sports editorial staff, deadlines galore and a basement with no windows and lots of photo chemicals nearby? We're not sure, but we like to call it Collegian Sports.

The Rookie

Paul Teves — I'd just like to begin by saying, I love water polo! I will never forget Casey Kane and Kobo at the Collegian party. You must keep more beer in the cup, Mike. My alcohol soaked Collegian t–shirt. Being trashed by Peyton Manning's No. 1 fan, you still are contradicting yourself.

I would like to give personal shoutouts to Matty Checo, my roommates Lawerence, Eric and Tony, despite the fact that he didn't make the intramural softball game. And all the other people who make my life a living heaven and hell at the same time.

Finally, I would just like to thank the chemical engineering graduate student who totally missed the Peyton Manning story. I would just like to thank him for contradicting himself several times in his letter to the editor. Manning did play in the Citrus Bowl in 1994, and lost to Penn State, otherwise you messed up the year or the quarterback, which would make Manning 2–2 in bowl games. But thanks for reading.

I get to do it all again next year, awesome.

Free Agents

Seth Koenig — I've got to start by giving credit once again to Rebecca Donaghue, who tore apart the A–10's back during cross country season. Tom Toye, Scott Price, Neil Concepcion, coach Ken O'Brien and the rest of the men's track team were not only talented, but a pleasure to work with as well.

I can't let this Misty–Eyed Memory column pass without toasting my team; the women's lacrosse team. Jorma left them to me in his proverbial will, and I will take great care. Tara Durkin, Jen Nardi, Fay Naber, Kara DePaula, Eileen Currier, Rachel Ingraffea, Shalee Merkle, Danielle McKeon, and Denise Brey — I'm watching the nine of you graduate, and I'll be there when you play your last UMass game.

I'd like to take a second to remember my first time in the Collegian offices this past fall, as I stumbled upon the sports editor at the time, Luke Meredith, and, unsure of what to cover, was convinced to write about what I loved: Sports.

Thanks again to Jorma, who not only bestowed onto me the best bunch of girls around, but taught me just about everything I currently know about how to write for the Collegian.

Kobo, Casey, the rest of the returning sports staff and the women's soccer team, I'll see you in the fall.

Brett Mauser — Ooh, ooh, ooh, can I please go to Olean, N.Y., again, where drive–thru liquor stores dominate the social scene? Dude, gimme a kegga, guy. Somehow Guess they don't have those in good ol' New Hampshire. Or maybe I could take a cruise to Bangor over the summer to relive the wintry days of hangin' with some dude with an axe outside my hotel window. I'll go eat some trees to pass the time with the rest of the crew up there. Grape Slush Puppie, four squirts, surefire hit. There, worst in history.

It sucks getting attached to teams in a matter of weeks. I found I probably won't climb the ladder in the world of public address announcing Volleyball got me pumping my fists, which really isn't good etiquette, eh? Did the same thing in Kansas when we almost silenced the Fieldhouse. Hee hee... mischief. That's why I dig this newspaper thing. Diving into end zones, scaling press boxes, and roping fries down the line for two–baggers rule. And please make some sort of sense in criticism letters, also. It helps. I tell ya, being serious is tough when college requires a poker face all the time. I mean, c'mon. Whoa, Brett, calm down.

Good luck to all the seniors who are tackling a world that is looking like Christian Okoye at the moment to me. Jorma, Luke, C.P., you guys'll be all right. Thanks for everything in my virgin year in print. Huh huh. Gotta boot. Behind again.

Aaron Saykin — Instead of the typical anecdote most of the sports writers will recreate for this column, I'm going to say "thank you" to some of the individuals who helped me out this semester.

First of all, I would like to thank all the beautiful female Collegian employees who danced with my drunk ass (and the rest of my body for that matter) at the staff party— funny stuff! Secondly, I have to give a mad shout out to the women on the crew team and coach Jim Dietz for a great season and for the extra info they sent me. Thirdly, I have to thank the entire skiing program, especially 79–year–old coaching legend Bill MacConnell and assistant Aaron Harsh (who happens to have a kick–ass first name).

Now I'm going to get misty by saying "thank you" and "goodbye" to some of the fellas I worked with this year, Jorma and Luke: it's been a pleasure working with and for you guys. You were the best! Good luck in the working world, Casey. Thanks for the purity test. You're now the editor–in–chief. Representing Holyoke... just be careful in The Sundown. Eiseman and Kenneth: You guys toss a mean frisbee around the office (Don't worry, I never told anyone about the PC you broke last month). And one last mad shout out to my fans, or what I like to call "those of you who actually read my boring sports stories," which were often buried on what the editors call the "second jump page" (Actually, that's a euphemism for the Arts & Living page). Next year, expect to see some columns from me. Pax ex (That means "peace out" in Latin.)

Signed to Long–term Deals

Jonathan Place — All the good stories I have about the Collegian are in last semesters' misty–eyed. As far as this semester is concerned, it was nice to get back on the back page with a football story and to know where I'll be in the fall. The NCAA women's tournament was a blast in Iowa. I learned that after about eight cups of coffee, it really doesn't matter how many you have. Perkins is a horrible restaurant, but it was the only thing open at 2 in the morning.

To Corey Peter Goodman — you were great to travel with this year and I'll never forget putting you in the figure four. I'll miss you, buddy. To Luke and Jorma — you two were the first ones to greet me down here in the Campus Center. Thanks for ruining my life. Good luck in whatever you'll be doing in the future. To all the other graduating seniors — you just wasted four years of your life down here in this dump. Get the hell out of here while you still can. Accomplish something, damn it. To everybody else — I'll see you next semester.

Jackie Leroux —Where to start? Academically, this has not been my best semester, but as always, its been a fun ride at the Collegian. Women's basketball, with Kathleen and Casey, laughing with Bakes at the press table. Damn it Kathleen, we missed the cookies again! We all know where they went though, don't we? L.A. or not, I still wish I'd made Iowa City and the Big Lebowski. Next year, no spring break plans for me!

Hey Jorma, how about that softball team huh? That Henderson, she's kind of, um, like, uh, good, ya know? Good luck to the softball team in the Regionals! Thanks Leigh and Cons for all your hard work.

It's going to be different next year with all of the old cronies heading off into the big bad world, and me being left behind as the oldest of the

UMass cracking down on underage drinking

By Paul Hayes
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — If you are an underaged student intending to drink off–campus, be prepared for a hard time.

In the past year, both the University of Massachusetts and town officals have devised tougher measures to combat underaged drinking problems. These problems include large off–campus house parties, and the proliferation of students with fake I.D.'s in Amherst bars.

The large off–campus parties, where minors are traditionally served alcohol, are seen as a nuisance by many town residents. Complaints they normally make about these parties is that they are too loud, result in litter and vandalism, and that drunken partygoers constitute a threat to neighboring residents.

To help solve off–campus drinking problems, the town and the University of Massachusetts have formed the Problem Solving Partnership, which is a committee of students, Amherst residents and school officials. The Partnership was formed to deal with the problems posed by local college students and alcohol, and they decided that their focus this past Spring would be the prevention of the "Hobart Hoe–Down."

The Hoe–Down was a large party which had been held every spring on Hobart Lane. The Partnership wanted to prevent a repeat of 1997's Hoe–Down, during which 58 people were arrested and a number of people were injured.

On two consecutive Saturdays, May 2 and 9 of this year, Amherst police officers closed Hobart Lane down and maintained a checkpoint to ensure that no party began.

In addition to a trend of heavier policing, the University agreed to extend its code of conduct to affect

Long lines at Whitmore offices a big part of UMass experience

By Jason Eiseman
Collegian Staff

Some people say they're "extremely slow." "Ridiculous," others say. Others still say they are unhelpful and prone to mistakes. Many students affectionately call it "Whitless."

They are talking about the Whitmore Administration Building, home to the Bursar's Office, Registrar's Office, Financial Aid Office, Housing Office and others.

Many students say Whitmore is the ultimate bureaucracy, a symbol of an administration mired in red tape.

"Unless you have a note from Billy Bulger himself, you can't get anything done," said Jeff, a sophomore computer engineering major, who would not give his last name. "You have to appeal everything 30 times to get something done right."

Jeff was at Whitmore on May 12 to fill out paperwork required for him to move off campus. He was short a few credits.

"Those are ridiculous hours," Jeff said referring to the 11 a.m.–4 p.m. hours of the Bursars Office.

Other students agreed with Jeff but said it is not the fault of the people who work at Whitmore.

"Patience is the key," said Cory Chase, an undeclared freshman, who works at the information desk in Whitmore. "It's a pain in the ass, but it's just something you have to do."

He said there is a lot of paperwork involved with the processes at Whitmore, and like It or not paperwork takes time.

"There's no way of making it quicker," Chase said. "Usually people have a problem if they're here, so it's not a pleasant experience."

Daniel Elias, a senior pre–med major, said he has had a lot of grievances with Whitmore.

"They're not helpful, they make mistakes all the time," Elias said. He suggested students follow up on the bal–

Understanding UMass' Student Government Association

There is a group of undergraduate students who control the 1.5 million dollars that fund Registered Student Organizations (RSO) and agencies in addition to making decisions on everything from putting bagel toasters in the Dining Commons to increasing lighting on campus, yet this group is largely unheard of throughout the student body.

The University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) is a group whose function is a mystery to most students.

SGA president during the 1997–1998 school year, Lin Wong described generally the function of the SGA.

"The SGA is the representative for any policy concerning student life and as a student voice," Wong said.

Speaker of the Senate for the 1997–1998 school year, Peter Kilbourne described ways the SGA is responsible for the RSOs.

"Except for RSO's own revenue the SGA decides all of RSO's money. We can freeze other people's [RSO] accounts if they are misusing them," Kilbourne said.

The majority of the $1.5 million is used to fund agencies such as the Craft Center, UVC–TV 19 and WMUA.

Kilbourne also mentioned ways the SGA directly affects students lives, such as stopping the practice of searching dorms rooms during fire drills.

"We passed a motion to saying this was unconstitutional and they stopped," Kilbourne said.

Revamping the meal plan and adding amenities to the Dining Commons is also within the SGA's power according to Kilbourne.

"We passed motions about the meal plan, making it possible for students on the 10–meal plan to eat on the weekends and making the Dining Commons open from 7 a.m. to 7 p.m. Even little things like adding bagel toasters and waffle irons," Kilbourne said.

Kilbourne pointed out larger issues the SGA has taken on over the years.

"A few years ago we tried to make the SATs optional. Especially with it being biased, and other campuses had started to do it. The motion didn't pass by only one or two votes," Kilbourne said.

Kilbourne explained how the motion passed by the SGA comes into effect.

"I have to take any legislation passed and forward it to the administration and advocate on behalf of the senate for the motion," Kilbourne said. "Most legislation brought to the administration is passed and if the administration does not respond in 20 days then it is automatically approved."

The primary people in the SGA who turn a motion into action are the speaker of the senate, the president and the student trustee.

The speaker is elected by the senate in May but the president and student trustee are elected by the students

Public Safety offers programs and tips

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Public Safety department offers many programs to students and faculty to ensure that the campus community remains as safe as possible.

UMass Police Chief John Luippold wants student to be aware of the options available to them and to immediatly call the Public Safety department if a student ever feels their safety maybe endangered.

Bike Registration

Students bringing bicycles to campus should register their bicycles with the campus to police to minimize the chances of the bicycles being stolen. According to reports in the campus police log, bicycles are reported stolen often.

Bike registration is free and a registration sticker will be put on the bike as well as the bicycle's serial number and description is entered into the police computer system.

Students also have the option to engrave their bike with the owners name and social security numbers. The engraving process can also be used with other valuables that students bring to campus. Students may borrow an engraver free of charge from the Public Safety department.

Escort Service

Public Safety also sponsors an escort service for students who feel their safety may be endangered or are afraid to walk alone at night on campus.

The Escort service has 10 designated stops around campus including stops in all five residential areas. The route takes approximatly 25 minutes to complete and the service runs from 5 p.m. to 3 a.m. seven days a weeks.

Students who do not want to walk from parking lots may also take advantage of the second escort van which runs from parking lots and the campus apartment complexes. The police department must be called for to utilize this program.

Protecting Yourself

Public Safety encourages all women to take advantage of the free self defense class, RAD, or the rape aggression defense class. RAD is offered once or twice a semester and is available free to all UMass female students and faculty. The class is small and is available on a first come first serve basis.

In addition to protecting yourself, police officers also suggest student

Students can now register for room without waiting weeks for results

By Victoria Groves
Collegian Staff

Students are now taking advantage of the new housing preference 1-800 number to register for an on-campus dormitory room.

The pilot program, entitled PAWS (Pre-Assignment Work Sheet) was tested last semester and allowed incoming students to request a living area over the phone and know what building they would be living in by the end of the phone call.

Normally, students have to wait weeks for their requests to be processed.

"More than five years ago, we started looking at how we could make it easier for our students. This plan would make it easier for our students. This plan would allow students to bond with the University much faster. The process now is very cumbersome," said Jerry Quarles, Assistant Director of Housing.

Currently, students apply for housing before they leave school in the spring, or for incoming freshman, at summer orientation. They are notified of their assignments about a month before classes begin.

The first of its kind in the nation, PAWS is expected to be used every year by 15,000 students.

"This is trailblazing... we represent 20 or 30 people who put a lot of effort into this. The fact that it made sense to you and that you didn't doubt it gives us a strong message," Quarles said.

Eventually expected to branch out to include the Internet, the pilot program involved the telephone so it would be accessible to more students.

"Eventually we will branch out to the web, but right now we wanted to use inclusive technology," Corey Edwards, Assistant Housing Office Manager, said.

PAWS is expected to be in full use a year from now, worksheets will be going out to students at home and they will be able to register for housing for the coming semester.

"Eventually all new students will be able to get their assignments by phone... I believe we will integrate well with NSP (New Students Program) and this will enhance students overall experience here at the University," Edwards said.

ances of the money they owe and other procedures at Whitmore.

But not every student finds Whitmore, "whiteless," some students think they do a good job.

"They're quick and efficient," said Michael Sbardella, a sophomore hotel restaurant and travel administration major. "Be aggressive, know what you want, have the right mindset."

Maria Moran, a junior sociology major, said students must be patient and understanding.

"You have to understand that there a lot of students on this campus, that's why things don't always go the way they're supposed to," Moran said.

On three occasions, Whitmore officials in the Registrar's Office would not comment.

off-campus students. As a result, students living off-campus could face fines or expulsion from school should they create a disturbance, or unlawfully have a keg in their possession, among other indiscretions. The University will apply the Code of Conduct to off-campus, but on a case-by-case basis because of the varying circumstances of each situation.

Underaged drinkers using fake I.D.'s have also caused problems for bar owners and employees.

The Time-Out Sports Bar, 37 North Pleasant St., was closed down after state Alcoholic Beverage Control Commission (ABCC) officials found a number of minors with fake I.D.'s drinking on the bar premises.

The Amherst Brewing Company, located at 24 North Pleasant Street, and Pruddy's Latin American Restaurant, 30 Boltwood Walk, have also had minors with fake I.D.'s found on their premises by ABCC officials.

"I lost a 21-year-old business, 14 people lost jobs, customers lost a place to go," former Time-Out owner Michael Fusia said. "Not one thing happened to the kids with fake I.D.'s"

Brewing Company owner John Korpita said he plans to prosecute the underaged female who was found drinking on his bar's premises.

"We are trying to find out who the minor that the ABCC found was, and we will press charges for trespassing, it will be our policy from now on," Korpita said. "We don't want to deal with this."

in March.

The office of student trustee works with the Board of Trustees on important issues such as tuition and acts as a Supreme Court in deciding issues that couldn't be solved through the normal University hierarchy.

Brian Tirrell, the student trustee for the 1997-1998 school year, described the position and emphasized the importance of students voting in elections in order to pick a competent person for the time consuming job.

"The student trustee represents students to the Board of Trustees," Tirrell said. "[If] you had elected someone as Trustee who has no experience in University policy or understands how the SGA or campus governing bodies worked, then the students are at extreme risk. [The Trustee] could implement ridiculous policies."

The SGA president is an advocate for the students. The position requires being on many committees, to work on long-term projects and to understand student concerns. The president brings those concerns to the SGA meetings ensuring the student voice is heard. The president also has the power to veto motions passed by the senate.

Wong explained why it is important students choose a president carefully.

"[The president] must represent the needs of the students. [A new president] would be doing a job for the student voice to be heard," Wong said. "Currently I'm on about six committees. Most things the student president does are long term," Wong said.

Some long-term goals Wong worked on are the Course And Teacher Evaluation guide (CATE), University Center 2000, and the Honors College.

"The president has to work on behalf of the students," Wong said.

The SGA president and student trustee for the 1998-1999 school year were elected in May after the original elections in March were nullified due to unconstitutional elections procedures.

Salwa Shamapande was elected SGA president in the last election and Eleanor Court was elected student trustee.

never leave their personal belongings unattended both inside and outside of your residence hall room.

"Don't let personal belongings sit unattended. Never leave your books or book bag unattended just to get a cup of coffee," Luippold said.

He also suggests that students should keep their doors locked at all times whether students are in their rooms, bathrooms or down the hall talking to a friend.

By keeping rooms doors locked at all times, theft of personal belongings can be prevented as well as peeping toms.

"If you see anyone on floor loitering or looking suspicious like they don't belong on floor students should call public safety immediately," Luippold said.

Also for students who may have knowledge of a crime or may want to report an incident but wants to stay anonymous may call 577-TIPS, and leave a message.

Lastly, Public Safety officials want students to know that the drinking age is strictly enforced on this campus.

"We strictly enforce the drinking laws on campus. If you are underage you should not be drinking. But those who chose to take that chance should be responsible about their drinking so you don't end up in a situation where you could be hurt," Luippold said.

By drinking responsibly, student will also be able to minimize the chances of finding themselves in a dangerous situations.

"A number of acquaintance rapes have been reported on campus. You should get to know individuals that you socialize with prior to being in a situation where you find yourself alone. You should go to a party with friends and go home with those same friends," Luippold said.

Students who have questions concerning any programs offered by the UMass Police department should call 545- 2121.

Letter from the editor

Welcome to the University of Massachusetts.

Right now you're probably just setting foot on campus, meeting new people and trying to figure out the pre- registration system. Maybe you've huddled in your room reading Details and Sports Illustrated trying to avoid eye contact with anyone around you.

Hey, we're there for you.

Welcome to the wonderful world of the Collegian. Or as the Germans say, Willkommen.

The Collegian is your paper, and the editorials are your voice. This paper is student run. We operate freely on this campus, reporting news without interference from the administration and voicing opinions that need to be heard. As you will see, this paper is an integral part of the community.

The Editorial/Opinion page is an opportunity for students to voice their opinions on anything that needs to be talked about — whether it's of international, national, or local concern. Whether by letter or column, this paper has acted as the voice of not only the campus, but the community for years now, and we are dedicated to carrying on this tradition.

Remember, if you don't like what is being said, it is your responsibility to change it. You have the ability to be heard. Like I said, this is your paper. We are always open to submissions. And please don't feel afraid to come down and write. We were all just like you at one point — scared, starry-eyed, confused. Hey, I was that kid hiding in the dorm room.

I am excited about the group of students we have writing for us this semester. I hope that we can stir some debate and even force some change on this campus. These writers have been recognized as excellent voices and I'm sure that you will find more than a few that you will read regularly.

Once again, welcome to UMass. Try to make your stay here as happy and as fruitful as possible. You may be worried about the future now, but everything will fall into place sooner than you may think.

There is a season...

So, you're all alone in a white, bare, dimly-lit room wondering how the hell you're supposed to know which classes to pick and if you'll ever be able to relate to the weirdos in your orientation group.

If you're like I was, you can't wait for your parents to come and bring you home and you may even be questioning your sanity in choosing to come to the University of Massachusetts.

Don't freak out. UMass only gets better from here on in. Honestly.

This fall marks my third year here, and I have come to appreciate the ups and downs of life at UMass in all its seasons.

Autumn brings crisp air, beautiful foliage and the perennial pleasure of add–drop period to campus. Your first two weeks here will probably be filled with excitement and confusion. There'll be lots of people to meet — about 17,000 other undergraduates — and more to do than you could manage in a lifetime. Be patient. Stay cool. This phase may look huge, but you will carve out your own niche soon enough. Remember, your experience at this University is completely unique, so do what you want to do — make the memories you want to have 30 years from now.

Tamar Carroll

Spend some time exploring your new home. You'll appreciate having your bearings straight during your first long walk home from a keg party. Take note of this scenario: the bonfire has gone out, there's a decided nip in the air and your hosts are kicking your sorry ass off their lawn... it's time to go home. But where is home? Maybe you made a few more trips to the keg than you really should have; Maybe you should have left when your roommate and everyone else on your floor did two hours ago...

Now you're feeling a little tipsy, a little disoriented, and Amherst sudden seems much, much larger. It would sure help if you knew in which general direction to head to get back to your dormitory and your sweet bed. (This is, by the way, why the physical education department offers an orienteering class). So, put on those walking shoes and familiarize yourself with your residence for the next four, five, or six years.

Hate pumpkin pie and stupid Halloween costumes? That's OK, because winter comes all too soon to the Pioneer Valley. That's right — before you know it, you'll be trudging to your 9:05 class, battling Arctic winds, and thinking, "I didn't think it got this cold in Anchorage, never mind Amherst." Winter does have its highlights here at UMass, though — including some of the best sledding known to humankind. Grab a Dining Commons tray (the bigger, the better) and head up to Orchard Hill Residential Area. Yes, it's a bitch of a walk up, but it's well worth it for the seconds–long rush as you rocket down the hill, knocking spectators — including that annoying kid who sits behind you in biology — flat on their backs.

One caveat: Try not to get a concussion. Because, you see, winter is also the busiest season of the year at Health Services, and it often seems as if all 17,000 flu–stricken undergraduates are in the waiting room at 11 p.m.

"Bleeding from the head, hmm," the triage nurse will say. "Well, that'll be about five hours. I'm sorry, but you'll have to sit on the floor for now. All of Sylvan Residential Area has contracted a stomach flu and we have no seats available at the present."

Fortunately, the gods generally stop punishing us sometime near mid–April, and all of campus suddenly comes alive. The flowers are in spectacular bloom, the trees are green again, the hippies from Central are barefoot and happy once more. Spring at UMass is truly glorious. Go to all of the campus festivities: Listen to the bands at Central Day, have a mellow time at Extravaganja, dance the night away at Southwest Week, and grill some burgers at Bowl Day.

The main challenge here is to pass your finals, so you can come back in the fall for another year of fun, UMass–style. Good luck — I hope you come to love this place as much as I do.

A word of advice

The best piece of advice I received as a freshman came from a seasoned Collegian reporter, a cynical senior named Henry, who told me on my second visit to the newsroom, "Come into the office a lot, hang out here, even when you don't have a story. Get to know people and get involved."

Looking back four years later, I sometimes wonder whether I should thank the man or curse him. After logging in about 30 hours a week for virtually no pay and zero academic credit, I constantly re–evaluate why I became so involved with the student newspaper. What did it give me in return for the countless sleepless nights, missed classes and gray hairs?

The answer is something completely intangible, something only a student involved in a Registered Student Organization can relate to. It's a feeling that comes in fleeting moments, like while walking across this huge campus, that you make a difference in among a vast sea of students.

It sounds like an empty statement by the chancellor in some brochure on why you should come to UMass, but its really true. They call it "co–curricular experience" — I call it getting involved.

Laura Stock

There are hundreds of groups on campus to get involved with, and each plays a role in the University community. On a campus of 25,000, its pretty difficult to distinguish yourself from the masses. Academically, there will always be someone who can get comparable grades. Running, or even being part of an RSO, can make you feel like you gave something to UMass, instead of just taking from it.

Granted, a lot of these positions are behind the scenes. There's not too much glory in getting up at 5 a.m. to make sure the bagels are delivered to People's Market, but the hundreds of students who patronize the student–run business every day certainly do care.

Being part of a high–profile organization, such as the Student Government Association, can have its pitfalls as well. SGA has the prestige and power of controlling student fees and allocating monies to other student organizations. With that, however, comes accountability to the student body and oftentimes, public scrutiny.

Which brings me back to the Collegian — the only RSO I can speak about with full knowledge. Spending night after night in a basement with no windows, writing and editing stories, only to wake up the next morning and have your professor point out typos on the front page is heartbreaking. But working at a student–run organization is a learning experience, and we all make mistakes.

Don't pity a student who contributes to a RSO, though. It may seem like being part of a student–run organization is a draining, thankless job — but there are benefits to be reaped.

I thank the Collegian for many things. I came in a shy freshman, writing 300–word blurbs of film reviews. A semester later, I was film editor, and started to sense the public recognized me — though most of the response came in prank–call form for panning a Jim Carrey movie.

By junior year, I made the leap to news reporting, covering crime on campus like assaults and rapes — inspiring me to go to law school following graduation. Being news editor during privatization protests and the Goodell takeover was thrilling, even though most of my work was done behind the scenes.

My current, and soon to be ending position of managing editor has been taxing, but worthwhile. My parents, friends and professors all think I am crazy to devote so much time to one organization which seemingly offers little in return. But being a part of this RSO was more than just a line on the resume for me — it gave me confidence and skills that I will use long after my time here at UMass is up.

After writing and editing at the Collegian four years, I have received some recognition, but most significant came last November in a post card from Costa Rica. After reading the paper on the Internet, Henry noticed my current editorial position, and dropped me a line to say he was proud his advice to a fledgling film critic worked.

So, in my final piece for the paper and the community that has given so much to me, I chose to pass on Henry's advice. Get involved. You will be rewarded.

Welcome to the zoo

Welcome to the University of Massachusetts. This will be nothing like your high school, assuming your high school had fewer than 25,000 students and comes up short of the umpteen hundred Registered Student Organizations we have here.

The publication you happen to be reading, the Massachusetts Daily Collegian, is 30 years old (as a daily paper) and is the largest New England collegiate daily (I'm sure we're bragging about that somewhere near the title on the front cover). I, as an extremely helpful person, will try to help you to understand the world of the Minuteman.

"Your biology seminar won't bring you out into a field to sing Kumbaya and hold hands."

Seth Koenig

In doing so, I think it would be helpful to answer some of the most commonly asked questions by students entering a university that can't always be asked of administrators (administrators will tell you you're hung like a rhino if you are a prospective student, but once you're paying bills, they won't give you the time of day).

• What's move–in day like?

Move–in day will be a bitch. I'm telling you now to expect to wait by your bags and appliances outside your dorm for as long as three hours (not necessarily, but be prepared for a bit of a time commitment) while hoping that it will soon be your turn to get into your room. If you managed to be placed somewhere other than Southwest, you might be able to avoid this disastrous occurance. Hope that Mother Nature is kind. Also, don't listen when they tell you that they open the doors at 10 a.m. Be there at eight or nine and get in early.

• UMass is a big school. How will I fit–in?

Don't be intimidated by the population. The people here are all really nice. I figure as long as you have your double–barrelled shotgun with you, nobody will give you problems. I found that upon cocking the gun, passers–by are more than willing to not only give you directions, but also walk you to class and do all your work as well. Bring your own gun, because if the UMass–issue weapons are anything like the UMass–issue modems (the TAUn), they won't do you a damn bit of good. (Seriously, though, unless you're a prick, you won't have any problems).

Go get involved in something, too. If you spend all of your free time sitting on your thumb, you'll be bored out of your mind — unless you have a lot of fun sitting on your thumb. That's kind of your call, I suppose.

• Am I allowed to have people of the opposite sex in my dorm room?

Of course. Although I think it would be rude to have someone in your room and not invite them to use your bed for the night. Always remember to be courteous.

• How will I be able to make it from class to class on time at such a large campus?

Get ready to walk a lot. You'll need to foot it to class and foot it to sports games as well. Don't fret about making it from class to class, though, for plenty of time is always allotted between classes to make it.

If you want something from Whitmore Administration Building, you'll need to walk just about everywhere else in the region as part of the most complex run–around known to man. Want a pen? Stop by the administrative building to pick up an ink writing permit that you must take to the Lederle Graduate Research Tower to be ratified and exchanged for a disk for your computer, which, upon reading, will tell you to return the disk to Lederle and get from them a receipt that the people at the University Store can run through the computer and translate into Yugoslavian. You must then bring this Yugoslavian document to the guy selling heroin on Pearl Street in Northampton, where you will get a piece of yellow paper with a password on it to bring to Whitmore to exchange for a pen. Enjoy.

• Will college be anything like orientation?

Don't worry — the touchy–feely, "let's get to know one another" crap usually ends when you return home from this hiatus. Your biology seminar won't bring you out into a field to sing Kumbaya and hold hands. Also, when you actually attend the school for real, they'll give up on caring where you are and when, and let you go further than the bubble of Northwest residential area. All of a sudden, Amherst, Hadley, and Northampton will not require chaperones. Hell, you will even be able to wander as far as, say, Central or Orchard Hill. That pesky curfew is gone, too.

• What about alcohol on campus?

Name a brand. If you're 21 years old, you can just go to a bar or liquor store and stock up. If you're not yet 21, you'll become good friends with someone who is very quickly. If you are straight–edge, like myself, you can't take yourself too seriously. Get used to hanging out with drinkers — or you can find the other two people at UMass who don't drink and play checkers.

• What about pot on campus?

Not a problem. Recall above sentiment. Parents, I'm just being realistic. Name a school where booze and joints are not sold in bulk.

• Is it worth it to go to UMass?

Yes. I may be sarcastic and complain a lot, but in all honesty, I love this place. There's a great variety of things to do and places to be, and as long as you're not afraid of trying new things, you will have a wonderful experience. I suggest that while having fun, you remember why it is you are attending college – to get money upon graduating. Prioritize, because otherwise even though your four years here will have been fun, your fifty years after will be hell.

Roommate rules

It all began during orientation, kids, so gather round and listen carefully — I'm going to tell you a little campfire story. The story I'm about to tell you wouldn't be so scary... if it weren't true!

At orientation, I was assigned to room with a kid named Jesus (that's Hey Zeus). So the first night I'm lying in bed and I hear him say. "Am I doing alright?"

"Uh, yeah... you're doing great. Keep up the good work."

At that he stirred. "What? Oh, sorry. I'm told I talk in my sleep sometimes." He then fell fast asleep, asking the same question over and over again, this time addressing it towards "Mommy."

"There may be nothing worse than a bad roommate. It's an albatross around your neck."

Mike Messaros

Oh, Jesus (that's Gee Zus).

So it began. I'm talking about the cycle of endless roommates rotating in and out of my room. Coming from Pennsylvania as an only child, I had no shortage of privacy. Now I was to share a small room with a stranger. It was the ignoble experiment, and so far it's been a failure.

Roommate number one was an Italian stallion whose favorite pick up line was "got any Italian in you?" His friends would come over and smoke on my bed, leaving their ashes all over the place. He once "entertained" a female friend while I was in the room. Like school on Saturday — no class. I was out of there in two weeks.

Roommate number two had no trouble questioning why I would belong to such a "fake" religion as Catholicism, while he had no problem telling people that he was a "Jedi." Yeah, most of the good religions didn't pop up until 1977.

Roommate number three cannot be explained. He was just this sketchy kid who seemed to process his responses for a good five minutes before he answered me. It was all subtext between us.

Roommate number four was kind enough to wake me up at eight every morning by blasting a taped speech by Louis Farrakhan. He left in a week. Thank God.

Roommate number five stayed one week until he got a room with a friend. He was rarely there, and when he was, he gave me tips on how to beat "Tomb Raider." He was the best roommate, Ever.

Roommate number six was a 24–year–old Army reservist. He drank alone in the room. He didn't communicate well, and most of the sounds he emitted were split between passing gas and grunting. He spray painted Metallica symbols on his stereo and TV. (He's 24! I hope to own my own apartment at 24, not be spray painting my furniture!) He had a special ability to watch TV and listen to his stereo all at the same time. To use one is human, to use both, divine!

I'm sure there will be a seventh — hey, there may even be an eighth. Maybe it'll be... you! (Maniacal laughter).

There may be nothing worse than a bad roommate. It's an albatross around your neck. You have to come home to your room, and there may be nothing worse than coming home after a long day of classes and finding your roommate stretching in his underwear, listening to "In–A Gadda–Davida." I could paint you pictures more pathetic than a drunk prom date based on what I've seen in my room.

I guess I have to draw some kind of moral from all this. Besides "stay out of my way". So, for the first time, I am putting into print my infamous "Roommate Rules." Hope the rules will help you get along better with your roommate and may even reduce tension. These were vague, mostly self– serving rules I invented in order to explain to my friends why my roommates sucked. Hey, you have to have rules to break them. So here we go:

1) The person in the room first may have rule over TV, stereo or video system. If you come in and your roommate is watching TV, don't blast your stereo. Roommates four and six ignored these rules blatantly.

2) No room nookie while roommate is present. Come on, you don't eat in front of a starving man. Roommate number one blatantly ignored this rule.

3) Don't talk about your girlfriend non–stop, especially if she is still in high school. Roommate number two was a convict when it came to this one.

4) Don't try and sucker your roommate into mindless chatter. When you have a problem with someone, don't huff and puff in front of your roommate; don't say "Well, I can't believe her." We don't care about your lady problems. Roommates two and three did this a lot.

5) Get out of the room every once in a while. To live with someone constantly is brutal on someone's nerves. Roommate six just sat there and stared. It killed me. Not only is it not good for yourself, it's not good for the roommate. Everybody needs some privacy, especially in college.

Follow these rules, grant your roommate some privacy and everything will be hunky–dory. Otherwise, you're going to be living in a room totally silent, thick with tension. It's not the best way to live. You'll learn a lot of things in your stay here, but maybe the best thing you'll learn is... how to fall asleep while your roommate is making kitty–cat noises in his sleep. I'm not kidding. Boo!

Forum for students of color

Hello, and welcome to all the freshman students of color. The University of Massachusetts Daily Collegian wishes you an eventful orientation, and a fulfilling freshman year.

UMass is such a big school that it's easy to get lost in the shuffle. A tip that I always like to give to incoming students is this: Find your own niche!

Edgar A. Barros

Whatever activities interest you — go for it! So much is offered here at the University, that is almost impossible not to find an activity, organization or event that appeals to you.

It would be in your best interest if I start out by introducing you to the Collegian — your daily source of news and information. We are currently New England's largest college daily. The Collegian won the award for not only the largest but also the best college daily in New England. Yes, that means that the Collegian is better than any daily newspaper produced at Harvard, Boston College, Dartmouth, MIT, Northeastern or any other schools in New England.

Hard to believe? Don't be startled. A lot of academic departments and organizations here at UMass are the best in the area, and several are among the best in the nation!

The Collegian offers an opportunity for young aspiring writers to get their feet wet. If you've had previous experience in the journalism field, you could possibly become an integral part of our paper. If you have no prior experience in journalism but have a lot of motivation, drive and desire to learn the Collegian might just become your niche as well.

Specifically designed to address current issues which are important to students of color, the Collegian includes within its pages, a Black Affairs page, a Multicultural Affairs page and a Developing Nations page. Each of these sections offer students a chance to read up on events which deal specifically with the ALANA (Asian, Latin American, African, Native American) community here on campus and the surrounding areas. These pages also offer a forum where issues concerning our community (students of color), not only at UMass, but nationally and globally, are addressed in an intellectual and straight forward manner.

If you aspire to be a news reporter for events which concern our community, come down to 113 Campus Center and visit the Collegian. If you are interested in writing on issues such as: affirmative action, Ebonics, racial issues on campus, racial issues in America, African politics, the economic development of our inner–cities, the economic development of African countries and the economic development of Latin American countries, get yourself down here right away.

If you possess knowledge which can help us progress as a people, it is your obligation to share it with the rest of us. Feel free to call the Collegian at 545–1851. Ask for Edgar A. Barros and tell him, "Hey, I want to write!"

Welcome to Jewish students

Welcome to UMass! As the Jewish Affairs editors for the Fall 1998 semester, we wanted to introduce ourselves and our page to you. There are two of us — Elana Premack and Morgan Tobor — who have taken on the Jewish Affairs page as co–editors.

Elana Premack

We understand how frightening and overwhelming it can be to walk into a college newspaper office as a freshman; – we have both just come through that phase. The Collegian staff is welcoming, they've brought us to where we are now. As editors, we are willing to help any incoming freshman in any way we can.

I'm Elana Premack and I am a sophomore journalism and pre–women's studies major. I'm from Springfield, Va. I was editor–in–chief of my high school paper and worked as a staff writer for Jewish Affairs and News at the Collegian throughout my freshman year at UMass.

Morgan Tobor

I'm Morgan Tobor and am currently a pre–journalism major. I'm from Chicago, Ill. My experience dealing with newswriting and reporting started my freshmen year. I worked as a staff writer for Jewish Affairs at the Collegian during my first year at UMass.

The Jewish Affairs page is a way to keep the Jewish community informed of relevant news and events. In the past year, we have covered events ranging from the Office of Jewish Affairs program, "Transforming Hatred," which brought Middle Eastern students together in a peaceful forum to Hillel's "Oy Veh, I'm Gay." a panel discussion on Judaism and homosexuality.

The University of Massachusetts offers a variety of religious options for Jewish students. The Hillel House, located on North Pleasant Street, hosts religious as well as social activities. The Kosher Meal Plan is offered through the Hillel House, as are many one–credit classes. Students also have the opportunity to live in the Jewish Living Community located on the upper level of the Hillel House.

Shabbat services are held at both the Chabad and Hillel Houses along with High Holiday services.

As new editors, we have many plans for the page and are looking forward to getting help in executing these plans. We want to continue coverage of events important to the Jewish community, include information about holiday celebrations in the Amherst area and bring to light Israeli issues.

We are looking for new writers for the upcoming semester. There are no prerequisites — you don't need to be Jewish and you don't need to be a journalism major. If you are interested in writing or in finding a place in the Jewish community, please come see us.

I am woman — hear me roar

Welcome class of 2002. As we embark on the new millennium, there will be many challenges that will change the face of America. As first year students at this University the issues of class, race and gender will surface. General education requirement courses, which many of you will take, will serve as a foundation for much of your new knowledge. As women in this society we must communicate with our male counterparts in the arenas of economics, politics and partners.

Unfortunately the picture that media portrays of women in today's society is weak and passive. On many television shows, women in relationships are often seen as fickle or confused. Rarely are women portrayed in movies in positions of high leadership. If this does occur, she is often viewed as "manly," or arrogant. Though these messages may appear subtle, they have a great impact on male and female views on gender roles.

Allana E. Todman

In America's business world today, women are told how they ought to appear. Dark colors like navy blue or maroon, are suggested, in order to have a more serious look. Studs for earrings, and dresses below the knee are also advised. In the business world a women should appear this way so that she does not allow her appearance to distract male workers.

With the ideology that the role of the woman is always seductive and appealing, these stigmas effect the labor market and how we are received. The fact that these basic dress codes are present, is a symbol that society is not ready to deal with women beyond their gender.

On the political aspect, Jane Harman, a candidate for governor in California, had an article written about her in The New York Times. Unfortunately the coverage of Harman was biased. The reporter focused only on quotes from Harman talking about her gender. One of the statements placed in the article was that Harman used the fact that she was a woman as a central tool in her campaign. Yet out of all the columns they laid out for this coverage, none of them included any of the political promises Harman spoke of. With such an article, how can a reader get a sense of what skills and attributes she could give as governor, if all that is promoted is that she is a woman? It is examples like this that denounces much of what women have to offer in today's America.

In the 1970s, women unified for more employment, child care, education and equality. Currently we have been continually struggling to erase the stereotypes that we are marginalized with. Today, more women are receiving increases in employment and education. As women in academia we have the choice to not fit into the margin that society has placed for us. Step out of what America says your role ought to be. Empower yourselves, and learn about who you are within.

As Americans of European, African, Asian, Latina and Indian descent, we have the one commonality of our wombs that unify us. We are the heart of America. Being able to produce children, we have the strength to change false images that are repeatedly portrayed.

We should not live in a society where we must prove ourselves, based on our gender. Yet it is through education and knowledge where we can challenge these stigmas. With a higher rate of women in challenging fields like engineering and computer science, all Americans must be prepared to interact with women on a new level. Assume the position, and take personal responsibility in presenting yourself as one who has confidence and assurance in the woman that you are.

Here at the university, the Collegian is a voice where students can vocalize their concerns. The Women's Issues page is dedicated to providing the student community with news, editorials, and interviews of women and news coverage from a woman's perspective.

If you like to write about issues concerning women, please stop by the Collegian, located in the Campus Center. This page will cover everything from national and third world events that are of concern to the students. News from the Five College community and the Pioneer Valley will also be covered. New ideas and writers are always needed. For further information call 545–1851.

The Stereotypical African–American, Or is it?!

My friends, my sisters and my brothers,
Question.
What makes one Black, material items, one's actions one's color?
I mean just because I like fried chicken.
collard greens and macaroni, golden biscuits, things like that...
Does this mean I must, or that I should, hurt because my skin is Black?
Is it the food I eat?
The clothes I wear?
The sneakers on my feet?
Does that make me Black?
Do these material items stereotype me?
So What does?
What makes one Black?
What makes one Yellow?
What makes one White?
I really couldn't tell you
However, I can't deny many of my Black brothers and sisters live up the stereotypes deemed the nature of the Black woman and the Black man.
If it isn't the baggy jeans and twisted hats
It's diamond rings and things like that
Ghetto sex with the girl he just macked
Basketball hoops to hard core rap.
Remember
It used to be Motown, Jazz, and Tap
Aretha Franklin, Lou Rawls and James
Then Jimi Hendrix made Purple Haze.
Yeah, I often wonder
What ever happened to them days?
I mean, I'm not complaining about the present
But now,
It's gangsters, guns and drugs
The most notorious biggie thugs gambling celo on the corner drinking beer and everywhere The big time cars
you know the scene,
The Acura, the Benz, the Lexus Coup
The female trophy with whom they troop her sexy clothes and polished nails
Her brand new weave in ponytails
Or, the eccentric braids that are very cute
The attitude which is very rude
Witty wits knife sharp and shrewd
"Yo whuz up, can we get some food?"
Her tennis bracelet and Reebok sneakers
The guys all saying
"Yeah she's a keeper"
Yet have no idea about how to treat her
(but that's another production)
Funny isn't it?
Funny how these images all seem true
But one has to remember
Not all Black people act or dress this way just because of the ones that do
So who's to say what makes one Black?
Who's to say you are acting Black?
Who's to say you are acting White, Purple
Mulatto, Asian, Haitian, Puerto Rican or Green
Who's to say anything?
I really couldn't tell you.
What do I know, is who I am on the inside and it shouldn't matter the color
I am on the outside. No one should judge another based on stereotypes, the color of one's skin or the clothes their in.
Let's stop the stereotypes and see others foe who they are: individuals.
Henceforth I ask once again my friends,
my sisters and my brothers
What makes one Black?
One's actions or one's color?

— Cassandra I. Carry

An ideal society for everyone

Ladies and gentleman, as your president I would like to give you the inside scoop on what our new "States of the United" (formerly known as the United States) mission will be in order to have no forms of oppression.

Allana E. Todman

People of the States of the United, you are looked at as an individual and an Statunan. With this Statunan status (pronounced sta–choo–naan) you are now an official citizen of this new nation. The fact that you have come from other foreign lands does not exclude your distinct heritage, but allows you to contribute to the many Statunans in our land.

In the school systems there won't be African, Asian, or Native American history classes. There will only be Statunan history. This history will be based on factual information that born Statunans have been part of. In order for this transition into a non–class distinction society, we will do our best to instill Statunan values and moral codes. By this we will not be assuming any type of inferiority because of race or class. We are all one–race Statunans.

There will be no economic term used for upper or lower class. Our goal is to take care of our people. After all, as Statunan people we are all similar in our humanity. Due to economic stratification though, some people will be at the top of the economic ladder, and others on the bottom of the ladder, but only because of their job capabilities. With this in mind we give the best Statunan education for our first and secondary students done for the Statunan States.

People, as we embark on living in a new nation we have to start from a clean slate. In order to record factual history on the way Statunans live, the government will delete all forms of statistical information which showed how the former labels of Asians, African Americans and Latinos, were when compared to the majority (at the time whites).

In our old nation (United States) we had the mentality that the whites were the overall breadwinners. We killed hundreds and thousands of Africans and brought them to our land. We also colonized the Native Americans. We blamed the people we labeled (blacks, Latinos) for lack of skill, but in fact, it was due to our old nations past downfall. With the one Statunan concept, we will redeem ourselves and now implement only Statunan principles.

By hearing my statements above, it is my strongest will and conviction that you begin to understand what the new Statunan approach is all about. With a people who look out for all, we need to look out for each other. All of these places in the States of the United are ours, we need to claim our States back. As Statunans we have forgotten all of our brothers and sisters.

The former people known to have labels of being European American, African American, Latin American and so on will be deleted. This will allow one to understand the Statunan. It is understandable if we say what shade a person is, but as far as colors are concerned, they all are part of the Statunan rainbow.

Now you may say, "Ms. President, how can we implement such radical morals?" The actual task will not be an easy task to achieve at all, but we must start somewhere.

A utopic society is one that is demonstrated here in the States of the United. For some critiques, an ideology of such a belief is impossible. But for others this type of concept may shed some light. In an American nation where our civilization was based on exploitation and colonization, examining the deep rooted effects this has had on America is very evident.

Will we ever have a nation that supersedes race and class? This question has been debated for decades. If the answers to this question were clear then this article would not be necessary. Unfortunately we must each ask ourselves these questions. At the same time maybe we can observe the Statunan people and learn something from them.

This is One Time for Your Mind.

NE

What do burning buildings, famous speakers, government scandal, peeping toms and the best resume builder on campus have in common? The News Department of the Collegian!

As a news associate or news correspondent you will be covering the latest issues and events on campus. We have beats where you can gain experience covering everything from the latest crimes to the biggest names that come to campus.

If you want to be a competitive candidate for internships and jobs, nothing on campus will give you hands-on experience like working for the Collegian News Department. Nothing will give employers a better sample of your writing than news articles. So come down to the Collegian and ask for Jill Carroll or call the News Desk at 545–1762.

Here in the Sports Department we cover a wide range of occurrences in the world of sports. Obviously, the main purpose of the page is to cover UMass sports, but we also run weekly columns on pro baseball, the NFL, NHL, NBA, and college football and basketball. In addition, we also run a weekly "Around the Horn" column, which allows any writer to take a crack at giving their viewpoint on the weeks sporting events.

Another plus in the Sports Department is the opportunity for travel. Just to name a few sites, UMass teams will play in Colorado, Michigan, and Hawaii this year. Last year writers travelled to Boyertown, Penn. for the Atlantic 10 baseball tournament and to Fenway Park for the baseball Beanpot, as well as various other locations.

Ed/Op writers have the ability to share their opinions with the whole campus, to anger the administration, or to tick off the SGA. For next semester, we are hoping to have a core group of writers who are eager, well–informed and articulate. If you're interested, come on down to the Collegian , ask for Mike Messaros. Or if you're a scaredy–cat, just give a call at 545–1491.

Student Businesses' delight

By Seema Gangadirkar
Collegian Staff

It's lunchtime and Earthfoods, a non–profit vegetarian cafe located in the Student Union, is open for business. The aroma of the day's menu hangs in the air, as customers find seats at the tables or get their food.

Sharon Wagner, who has worked at Earthfoods for a year, says the cafe's mission "is to provide vegetarian and cheap food for the students. Our primary goal is to make sure the students are getting what they want."

Like other student–run businesses on campus, Earthfoods is a cooperative business, which allows the employees to share an equal voice in the functions of the business.

"We're all equal in terms of responsibilities. We're all managers. There's no boss," said Wagner, a junior environmental science major and a member of Earthfood's outreach committee.

Earthfoods' 27 members participate In 18 different committees which ultimately make the decisions on how Earthfoods will be run. According to Wagner, employees are elected every semester to the committees on which they serve.

The outreach committee for example is responsible for advertising, bringing in new people and making the atmosphere comfortable for customers.

According to Liz Karney, a junior social thought and political economy major, the committees hold weekly meetings to make decisions.

"We vote on different things like events we're going to help out," Karney said.

From cooking to clean–up, the Earthfoods' employees are involved in every aspect of running the business.

"Students basically do everything," Wagner said. "We work seven to seven, Monday through Friday."

And because of the cooperative nature of the business, the schedule allows for flexibility in duties.

"The time you have available to come dictates what you're going to do. If you come in at seven [in the morning], you cook the entreé or the soup. It's never predetermined," Karney said. "You just decide, whoever feels like doing what. It's pretty much like that all day."

Like other student–run businesses, Earthfoods inspires a passion from its employees.

"It's interesting because I'm used to having a job where you go to work, then you leave work and then work is done. This place occupies my thoughts all the time," Karney said. "There's something about working on a collective level and with people instead of for people or having people work for me."

Earthfoods is open during the semester from 11 a.m.–3 p.m. Monday through Friday.

The People's Market

From the crates of red delicious apples to the stacks of Celestial Seasonings Tea, the People's Market offers students a variety of snack foods from bagels to cheese, coffee to juice and other natural products.

According to Laura Slotnick, a freshman theater major who is in her second semester at People's Market, the store's main products are coffee and bagels.

"Mainly, we're trying to get people who just grab and eat," Slotnick said. "It's just quick. You grab your bagel, you grab your cream cheese and you put it together."

According to Slotnick, People's Market was started 25 years ago by a group of seven women, who focused on selling mostly bulk items such as rice and beans.

"They were really going out on a limb," Slotnick said. "There weren't any other student businesses around [at that time], there wasn't any Center for Student Businesses. They were just doing it."

These days, People's Market is in plenty of company with other student–run businesses and like those other businesses, People's Market is a collective effort.

"There are 25 of us who are all managers," Slotnick said. "We have these committees and there is an overall committee, it's called the core committee. They are supposed to look at the Market as a whole."

Last spring, privatization on campus concerned the UMass community, especially in the way that privatization would affect the student–run businesses. Slotnick said that privatization is not as big of an issue now.

"It's an issue, but if you talk to the people who are doing [Student Union 2000], their plans are all revolving around us being here," Slotnick said.

People's Market offers a flexibility that is difficult to find other businesses.

"In other businesses, you do the same thing over and over again," Slotnick said. "This you get to be creative. You always have to be on your toes because there Is no one keeping an eye [on you]."

People's Market is located at 328 Student Union.

Sweets 'n More

The aroma of freshly baked brownies wafts through the lounge of the Field Resident Hall, as residents crowd into the Sweets 'n More snackbar. Serving up treats for the often–hungry college student on study break, Sweets 'n More's menu includes cookies, brownies, Rice Krispie Treats, Italian ice, grilled–cheese sandwiches, bagels and more.

Jessica Maravel Piccolo, a sophomore music major, has worked behind the counter at Sweets for four semesters and says that the experience of working at a student–run business turned out to be much different than what she expected.

"When I first worked there, I thought it was just going to be behind the counter job and it turned out we have to do everything. We have to buy the food, order the food, do the books," Maravel Piccolo said. "It's basically running a business." In addition, Sweets' employees are also responsible for advertising, payroll, the upkeep of the store as well as meeting inspection guidelines set by the University of Massachusetts' Department of Environmental Health and Safety.

Like other student–run businesses, Sweets does not have a direct supervisor, rather they govern themselves.

Maravel Piccolo said that the employees at Sweets meet once a week for an hour and a half to make major decisions.

"At Sweets, we all [make decisions] because we are a co– op and we all have an equal voice," Maravel Piccolo said.

Maravel Piccolo says that one of the most difficult aspects of working for Sweets is the scheduling of the different shifts around classes and other activities.

"It's scheduling weekly all–staff [meetings] People have classes at night, during the day. Weekends are no good because people go home," Maravel Piccolo said. "It's getting all of us in the same place. And there are only eight of us. Sylvan [Snackbar] has like 16 [employees]. I don't know how they do it."

Maravel Piccolo works five hours a week behind the counter, but she also spends a couple hours a month working with the advertising committee in addition to the weekly all staff meetings.

Maravel Piccolo also points out that running a business involves keeping an eye on every little detail.

"If something breaks and it's my turn to go to the cluster office to [fill out] a report and I forget to do it, then that causes problems," Maravel Piccolo said.

But working at Sweets has definitely been a good experience for Maravel Piccolo.

"It's nice to know how to run a business, even though I'm a music ed major," Maravel Piccolo said. "It has nothing to do with my career path, but now I have better perspective [on how to run a business]."

Pacino a coach in football drama; Kubrick secretive on Cruise movie

Tom Cruise may have a new mission next summer when John Woo takes the helm of Mission: Impossible 2.

By Bryan McAllister
Collegian Staff

Tom Cruise will be wanting plenty of shut–eye after finishing Eyes Wide Shut, the Stanley Kubrick film starring Cruise's wife Nicole Kidman. The super–secret production, said to be a psychosexual drama, began in November, 1996 and was finally thought to be finished this past February.

However, Kubrick, known for demanding numerous takes and absolute perfection, called Cruise and Kidman back to London this spring for reshooting. The acclaimed director of 2001: A Space Odyssey and The Shining also decided to remove all scenes involving Jennifer Jason Leigh and refilmed them with actress Marie Richardson.

Cruise won't be taking much of a break, though, if he wants his Mission: Impossible 2 to arrive in theaters next summer. After dismissing Oliver Stone as a possible director, Cruise is in talks with Face/Off's John Woo to helm the sequel. Stone, meanwhile, has assembled an all–star cast for his football drama On Any Given Sunday. Al Pacino, Tommy Lee Jones, David Duchovny, Cameron Diaz and, yes, rapper–producer Sean "Puffy" Combs will all appear in the film. Pacino will play a coach, "Puffy" a football player.

The blockbuster Godzilla team of producer Dean Devlin and director Roland Emmerich will reunite with Will Smith, whom they worked with in Independence Day, on the sci–fi epic The Mark, about a man who receives a mark on his body from a dying stranger that brings him superhuman powers. Bruce Willis and Ben Affleck try to save the world in the testosterone-laden space epic Armageddon.

By Bryan McAllister
Collegian Staff

On the set of this summer's thriller A Perfect Murder, Michael Douglas slicks back his hair and suits up his tuxedo in preparation for filming. His co-star, Gwyneth Paltrow, looks equally elegant. But there's greed, jealousy and evil lurking behind the masks here, and who better to pull it off than the two icy actors.

Behind the deviously banal title is also another conspiracy — they're remaking Alfred Hitchcock here. The original title was Dial M for Murder, made in the early 50's and starring Ray Milland and the immortal Grace Kelly.

Which proves that this summer, Hollywood is pulling out all the stops, taking risks. Surprise, surprise, they may just pull it off. Now that would be perfect.

There's no Arnold, no Tom, Brad or Will this summer, but for those savoring a return to fun and glitz, we do have Mel, Harrison, Uma and Antonio.

Others might be more than content to find pure cinema in Saving Private Ryan, The Truman Show and Terry Gilliam's Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas, a film that may get lost in the crowd but certainly will provoke the mind on those hot seasonal nights.

Summer '98 offers a little bit of magic for everyone. Disney's annual feature is the sprawling Mulan; there's a Cinderella remake starring Drew Barrymore; director Brian Singer will follow up his sleeper hit The Usual Suspects with Stephen King's Apt Pupil; action fans will not be disappointed with Nicholas Cage's Snake Eyes or Sean Connery in The Avengers; and the summer's best market, the science fiction film, will get a treatment from The X- Files and Godzilla. The following is a look at the most anticipated movies of the season.

SIX DAYS, SEVEN NIGHTS
Directed by Ivan Reitman

A romantic getaway for Anne Heche and boyfriend David Schwimmer turns into a disaster when their gruff pilot (Harrison Ford) crashes the plane, and Ford and Heche are left stranded together on a South Seas island. Director Reitman originally planned to shoot the film as a pure romantic comedy, but after buzz about Heche's relationship with Ellen DeGeneres, he upped the adventure aspect.

THE GOOD: The preview looks spectacular — a beautifully photographed Romancing the Stone-type adventure, with Ford back in his no-nonsense Han Solo/Indiana Jones mold, sans fedora and whip, of course.

THE BAD: Reitman's best films — Ghostbusters and Twins — were made a decade ago; his last effort was Junior. Audiences may have trouble accepting Heche and Ford's chemistry.

VERDICT: Summer and Harrison Ford? Betting on the Bulls isn't even that safe.

SAVING PRIVATE RYAN
Directed by Steven Spielberg

World War II is Hollywood's playground, and is no stranger to Spielberg, who filmed Raiders of the Lost Ark, Empire of the Sun and namely Schindler's List around that historic event. Saving Private Ryan brings the filmmaker back to that arena, with Tom Hanks as a soldier who sacrifices is own life to save a paratrooper, played by Matt Damon, across German lines.

THE GOOD: Pure talent — Spielberg, Hanks, Damon and co-scripter Frank Darabont (The Shawshank Redemption). The recreation of the Normandy invasion promises to be among the most graphic battle scenes ever captured on film.

THE BAD: Ironically, summer audiences used to science- fiction battle may not have the appetite for realistic, wartime human destruction.

VERDICT: Spielberg has been preparing for this one ever since he was 13, set up miniature soldiers and placed his dad's amateur camera to his eye. Saving Private Ryan should be this summer's best film.

THE MASK OF ZORRO
Directed by Martin Campbell

Antonio Banderas dons the black garb in this energizing rendition of the adventure/romance serial classic, with Anthony Hopkins as his mentor, and the scorching newcomer Catherine Zeta Jones his object of affection. Zorro went through some production problems before Goldeneye director Campbell took over; it's been smooth sailing — or riding, in this case — since then.

THE GOOD: Banderas had this type of role pinned down in Desperado, and executive producer Spielberg ensures it will be classy.

THE BAD: TV remakes, in the immortal words of George Bush, are "bad, bad."

VERDICT: Problems on the set aside, Zorro looks very sexy and a lot of fun.

ARMAGEDDON
Directed by Michael Bay

There's a clock, a gift from Disney, that sits on top a Collegian computer, counting down the days till 7-1-98, the release of Armageddon. The hype is as big as the movie itself — kind of a half Volcano, half Apollo 13 mix starring Bruce Willis as the head of a drill team that remains the only thing between Earth and an asteroid the size of Texas.

THE GOOD: You can count on producer Jerry Bruckheimer (Con Air) and director Bay (The Rock) to get the testosterone flowing.

THE BAD: Staggering lack of originality. Plus, destructive space objects are popular, and Deep Impact, released next Friday, has Armageddon beat.

VERDICT: "Man's finest hour," as the film's tag-line promotes, may be Hollywood's worst.

THE TRUMAN SHOW
Directed by Peter Weir

"All the world is a stage, and we are merely players," rings the quote from Shakespeare. Imagine your whole life being set up, fake, with everyone watching, and you have The Truman Show. Peter Weir's comedy/drama starring Jim Carrey in his first true acting role. Weir got Robin Williams to pull it off in Dead Poet's Society, can he accomplish the same feat here? Carrey is Truman Burbank, a kid who grows up to find out his life has been a 24-hour cable TV show masterminded by a brilliant producer (Apollo 13's Ed Harris). How will he turn out?

THE GOOD: Australian Weir (Dead Poets Society, Witness, The Year of Living Dangerously) is one of Hollywood's most intriguing craftsman. Superb script from Gattaca auteur Andrew Niccol.

THE BAD: Awful promotion campaign. Paramount has a great film on their hands and instead are marketing it like just another Jim Carrey comedy.

VERDICT: Early buzz on the film has been nothing less than astounding — The Truman Show might be the surprise of the year.

THE X-FILES
Directed by Rob Bowman

Bowman may be the director, but the creative force here is inarguably Chris Carter, the founder of the greatest cult TV hit since "Star Trek." Like that science-fiction phenomenon, "The X-Files" is easily the most cinematic show on television. Will it translate to the big screen? Most definitely, as David Duchovny and Gillian Anderson take over where they left off from the cliffhanger episode set to air later this month.

THE GOOD: This long-awaited epic will be savored by die-hard fans, and the preview shows it should deliver to the rest of the crowd, too.

THE BAD: Still, if you don't know your "X-Files" in and out, you're kinda screwed.

VERDICT: Carter redefined television, but film will be much harder.

LETHAL WEAPON 4
Directed by Richard Donner

The Lethal Weapon series is perhaps the only one, save James Bond, that we welcome with a gleeful smile. It's hard to get tired of the Mel Gibson-Danny Glover banter, and this time around Chris Rock joins the fun along with series staples Joe Pesci and Rene Russo.

THE GOOD: After a couple of quirky or serious recent roles, Gibson returns to the form that made him the most- fun-to-watch movie star of the 80's. Rock should make a welcome, hip addition to the already colorful cast.

THE BAD: Lethal 4 was filmed so fast that the cast didn't even have a finished script when shooting began.

VERDICT: The preview proves that 4 will be fun, bottom line.

Mezzanine an Attack of music innovation

By Marty Keane
Collegian Staff

MEZZANINE
Massive Attack
Virgin

The best music is never a reaction to a trend or movement. It instead looks forward and sets the standard for all other contemporaries to aim for. Think of the most credible musicians of the modern era in an artistic sense: the Velvet Underground, the Beatles, Bowie, Pink Floyd, the Stooges. Each made music that didn't attach itself to a pre-existing formula and work to refine and perfect its sound. Rather, they set the standard for others to follow by creating the blueprints.

Many have tried to copy the Beatles, but no one has succeeded in surpassing the Fab Four because, given the choice, anyone with half a brain will still gravitate toward the original over the copycat. It makes perfect sense.

Such is the case with Bristol, England's Massive Attack. Originally a group of like-minded DJ's, the group formed out of the remnants of the Wild Bunch crew — amongst them Tricky, Neneh Cherry and Geoff Barrow of Portishead.

With their 1991 debut Blue Lines, Massive Attack singularly re-defined non-techno dance and British soul with a body of songs that to this day sound as fresh and innovative as they did almost a decade ago. Since then, Tricky and Portishead, both who've each had more success than Massive Attack in gaining a foothold Stateside, have emerged in their own right as credible artists. Still, they will always lurk in a Massive shadow.

On Mezzanine, the Bristol, England-based group progresses uneasily towards a richer, more complex musical vision. Considering the album is wrought with the paranoid musings of someone who's neither here nor there, the title is a logical one. Played through, Mezzanine sounds just what the title implies. The eleven songs are a journey, with a strong recurring feeling of movement throughout and the unease that goes with it. The theme of transition and the paranoia that comes along with it are everywhere on Mezzanine. Massive Attack are clearly in the midst of an engaging transformation from that of the collection of electronic wizards who turned the world onto trip-hop into a group preparing for the uncertain by obsessing about it. Simply put, it makes for a fascinating listening experience.

For starters, there's the abrasive guitar layers that underpin reggae legend Horace Andy's soaring vocals on the opening "Angel." It's the sound of someone trapped in their own personal hell trying to worm their way out by crying out to those above.

"Risingson" is a brilliant, albeit disturbing, meditation on the duality of drug psychosis and the late night culture of club life. The duelling vocals of Daddy Gee and 3D provide for some intriguing lyrical interplay: "Toylike people make me boylike" has endless possibilities into its meaning.

As always, the boys in Massive have enlisted several of their lady friends to sing on their twisted instrumentals backbones. Cocteau Twins' Liz Fraser weaves a magical spell on "Teardrop" while Sara Jay performs the stirring "Dissolved Girl." Both are heartbreaking in their emotive energy, a feat unseen in any electronic music genre since Shara Nelson's turn on "Unfinished Symphony," off Blue Lines.

Lasting, memorable music always comes from somewhere else, but still manages to comment on the greater society in which it exists. Like Radiohead's OK Computer and Pulp's This Is Hardcore, Massive Attack gaze skeptically at where we are as a global community in this pre-millennial age. The picture they paint is bleak and dreary, and for good reason. Who among us truly believes that all is fine and dandy with the world? And besides, a hearty dose of sobering realism has always been a key ingredient for making great music.

The only fault one can find with Mezzanine is that they've done all this before. They've already broke all the rules and made new ones. The album of the semester? Easily. The album of the year? Most likely. The album of the decade? Sorry, they've already made it. A

As if advertising wasn't abrasive enough, the Wall Street Journal reported this spring that the Miramax studio will join with Tommy Hilfiger Corp. to design a special effects-laden film to be released this winter. Speaking of crazed marketing, Sony plans to release a second Titanic soundtrack album – "Back to Titanic" – on July 28, coinciding with the home video release of the blockbuster film. The "sequel" will feature music by the ship string quartet, Il Salonisti and the Irish pub band Gaelic Storm.

"This was a full-blown World Series experience as far as I was concerned."

There were many milestones for the Minutewomen during the season. First, Sortino earned her 600th career win on Senior Day at Totman Field. In addition, Henderson was named the A-10 Pitcher of the Year for the second consecutive season. Gutridge, Osier, and junior Becky George were also named to the All-Conference team.

UMass entered post-season play with a 42-12 mark, and was riding a 19-game winning streak.

The Minutewomen will lose only Osier, Gutridge, Liz Wagner and Buckley to graduation. With Henderson and Carrie Jeffries returning on the hill, along with position starters Mandy Gulas, Faessler, George, Annie Smith, and Kiley Scofield, and platoon players Octavia Brown, Katie Kenderski and Debbie Tomoguchi, UMass appears to be ready to make yet another run towards the NCAA tournament in 1999.

Women's soccer has high hopes for 1998 success

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

Forgive the Massachusetts women's soccer team if it seems to bask in the glow of its 1997 season, one in which the Minutewomen closed up shop with a 17-5 record.

Sure, a first round loss in the NCAA tournament was disappointing, but that was one of the few things that went wrong for UMass last season.

The Minutewomen steamrolled through the Atlantic 10 with a 13-0 mark, and easily won the tournament championship as well, eventually finishing with a No. 21 national ranking.

Although the team did lose four key players to graduation in Danielle Dion, Erica Iverson, Amy Burrill and Liz Rutherford, the Minutewomen still have a talented core of players remaining. Add a strong incoming freshman class into the mix, and things shouldn't skip a beat for UMass this year.

Leading the way for the Minutewomen this year will be junior Emma Kurowski, the team's second leading scorer last year and a first-team All A-10 pick. Complementing Kurowski up front will be sophomore Kara Green, who led the team in points (38) and assists (14) in 1997.

Senior Sophie Lecot will once again be one to watch for UMass, after a solid junior season in which she was near the top in practically all UMass offensive categories. Sophomore Brooke Bartlett emerged as another weapon in the coach Jim Rudy's arsenal last season, and should only improve on a successful freshman campaign.

Also returning for the Minutewomen will be third team All-Northeast Region pick Amanda Thompson, who will headline the UMass defensive core. Angie Napoli appears to be the favorite to take over for Dion between the pipes.

Other returnees for UMass in 1998 will be Kate Webb, Tara Tokarchik and Cindy Garceau, along with Kathleen Machamer, who sat out last season after tearing her ACL.

"Their attitude has been good," Whipple said. "Some of their confidence needs to improve. They need to not worry about the last play but to focus on the next one."

Come this fall, questions should be answered: positions should be filled and a strategy down, but don't get overexcited, this is a rebuilding season and UMass has a long ways to go.

"We've improved daily," Whipple said. "There has been a lot going on. It's been positive. As long as key players perform, we'll be alright."

The first game of the year will see the Minutemen kicking off the season against Delaware on Sept. 5.

a game, were handcuffed by the stingy UMass defense, limited to 8 and 4 tallies respectively. Among the team's full-time defenders, there wasn't a single graduating senior. Defender Lynne Young, entering her junior year, was a second-team Northeast All-America selection in 1997, and classmates Jessica Passanese and Melissa Miele, as well as soon-to-be sophomore Denise Brey, deserve credit for leading the unit.

The cornerstones for the exceptional defense were goaltenders Tara Durkin and Jen Nardi, two recruits that stoned countless opposing scoring opportunities to solidify a position that had previously been weak.

Although the defense was the pride and backbone of the squad, the offense was no slouch. The Minutewomen will be returning four of their top five leading scorers in Laura Koritz, Stephanie Pavlick, Fay Naber, and Melissa Anderson, along with energetic midfielders Noelle Gorski and Rebecca Minaker.

This was the year that the three seniors, Amy Leder, Jen Bowen, and Jen Herker, finally saw UMass obtain that prestige that it had once lost. Over four difficult seasons, only those three remained from a class of 10. With a 9-5 record over a schedule of strong teams, it's true that UMass is back, and with only three players leaving, it's safe to say that UMass is going to stay a while.

Looking back over a year of UM sports

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

This Orientation Issue has already covered a wide variety of the sports that UMass has to offer, but for the things that haven't been mentioned, here's a look at last year:

Men's soccer: The Massachusetts men's soccer team had a successful season in 1997. The Minutemen held first place in the Atlantic 10 until the last weekend of the year, but missed out on the A-10 tourney.

Field hockey: The Minutewomen came through to win the A-10 title in 1997. UMass eventually fell to Penn State in the first round of the NCAA tournament.

Men's and women's cross country: Both of these teams enjoyed quality seasons, and the Minutewomen won the A-10 crown.

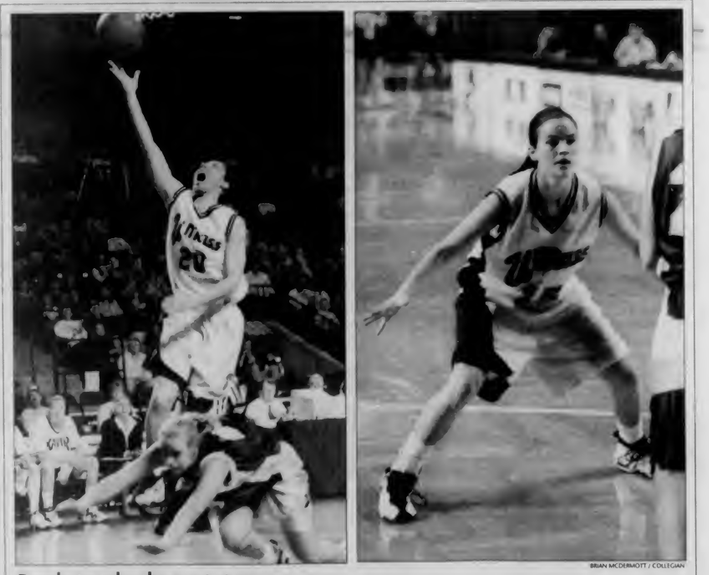
Men's water polo: The Minutemen once again solidified their claim as one of the best teams in the country, battling a grueling schedule to post one of the best records in school history.

Volleyball: The UMass volleyball team hung around in the middle of the A-10 pack, hovering around the .500 mark and narrowly missing the A-10 tourney.

Ice hockey: The UMass hockey team struggled with injuries and finished up with only six wins. However, the highlight of the season was a 4-3 victory over New Hampshire, an eventual Final Four squad.

Men's and women's gymnastics: Both teams had winning campaigns against some of the best teams in the country. Freshman Jill Fisher was named an All-American for the women's team.

Men's and women's swimming: The men won the A-10s, while the women finished at 8-3.



Men's and women's track: Both teams had winning seasons and finished behind Virginia Tech at the A-10s.

Crew: The crew squad won the A-10s and moved on the NCAAs. They were second in the nation in 1997.

Men's and women's tennis: Both teams came through with winning seasons and are regarded as two of the best up-and-coming programs in the nation.

Men's lacrosse: The Minutemen appeared to be on their way to an NCAA tournament berth before hitting the skids midway through the season.

Women's water polo: The Minutewomen had a great season with 30 wins while buzzsawing through everyone on their way to Nationals.

Minutemen make return to NCAAs

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

After a 1996–97 season which saw the Massachusetts men's basketball team close up shop with a 19–14 record, there were those who wondered if the Minutemen were starting to lose their grip as a national power.

And, when UMass opened up the 1997–98 season at 2–2, and then 4–3, including a two–point win over lowly Marshall, that point could be even more well taken.

However, coach James "Bruiser" Flint and the rest of the Minutemen weren't going to allow that to happen.

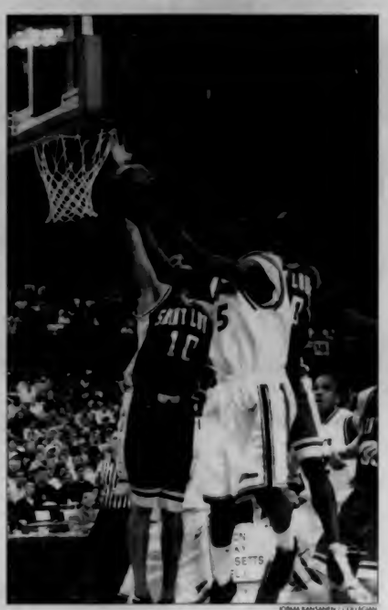
UMass rebounded by going unbeaten in the month of January, and with the help of that run, reached the NCAA tournament for the seventh year in a row, eventually losing to Saint Louis in the first round. The Minutemen finished the season with a 21–11 record.

"We had a great season. We played at a higher level than we expected," Flint said. "We had some tough losses, but we had some fantastic wins, too."

Yes, tough losses. They don't get any tougher than a loss to Temple on the final day of the regular season. A win would have given the Minutemen the Atlantic 10 Eastern Division crown, but the loss dropped them to third place. Then there was a double overtime heartbreaker to eventual Elite Eight squad Rhode Island, a game that was extended into an extra session not once — but twice — by guard Charlton Clarke.

Fantastic wins. Well, how about a 31–point drubbing of George Washington in the William D. Mullins Center. There was also a clutch win over A–10 tourney champ Xavier in Cincinnati, a win that more than likely clinched that NCAA berth for the Minutemen. And who can forget another double overtime thriller on Senior Day, a game that once again saw Clarke's heroics lead UMass to victory.

The Minutemen will lose only senior Tyrone Weeks to graduation. Senior Lari Ketner, a first–team All–Atlantic 10 selection last year, will be a formidable force in the paint. Also returning up front will be junior Mike Babul, an All– Defensive Team pick last season, and juniors Chris Kirkland and Ajmal Basit. Redshirt freshman Ronell Blizzard is also expected to get some time after sitting out last season.



The backcourt looks just as strong, with Clarke, an All–A– 10 third team pick, and Monty Mack, an All–Rookie Team selection returning to run the show for UMass. Sophomores Jonathan DePina and Rafael Cruz should also see plenty of action, along with Winston Smith, who missed practically all of last season with a torn ACL. Other returnees include Andy Maclay and Ross Burns.

However, even though Weeks is the only loss for UMass, Flint feels that hole is one that desperately needs to be filled by one or more of the returning players.

"The loss of Tyrone is going to affect us a lot more than people think. He was a great leader and was almost like a big brother out there," Flint said. "And it almost seemed like there was a correlation, that when he struggled, we struggled as a team. We're going to need someone to step up and take his place and be a leader."

UMass will also receive a boost with the addition of guard Shannon Crooks, who transferred from St. John's. Crooks will have to sit out this season, but will have three years of eligibility left. This addition, along with the return of Blizzard and Smith, is a bonus according to Flint.

"Basically, we've been able to add three players without recruiting," Flint said. "We hope that they will help us out especially towards the end of the season, so that we have more guys who can go out there."

JORMA KANSANEN / COLLEGIAN

Monty Mack will be one of the key returnees for the 1998–99 edition of the Massachusetts men's basketball team.

UMass baseball wins 5th straight A–10s

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

Repeating a win for any type of title is pretty tough. A three–peat, is possible, but very difficult.

What about winning your league title five years in a row? That's pretty impossible. Even the Chicago Bulls dynasty couldn't do that.

Well, the Massachusetts baseball team won its fifth consecutive Atlantic 10 title this spring, finishing with a 15– 3 mark in the league. UMass posted a 27–11 regular season mark and gained a No. 1 seed in the A–10 tournament.

"Winning the league five years in a row is a very hard thing to do," Massachusetts baseball coach Mike Stone said. "We feel good about it."

The season started off on a sour note, as the Minutemen went 5–5 during an early season trip to Florida. However, once the Minutemen returned to the friendly confines of New England, they hit their stride, winning 22 of 28 contests.

UMass was aided by one of the most potent offensive attacks in the nation. The Minutemen posted nearly 10 runs an outing, and had a team batting average around .330.

Individually, senior second baseman Muchie Dagliere led the way for UMass, as he hit well over .400 and was among the team leaders in runs batted in. Senior right fielder Pete Gautreau was also among the team leaders in home runs and RBI, and had an average around .370 for the season. Junior co–captain Doug Clark was also near the top in all three categories. Together, these three players formed the heart of the UMass batting order.

Others who contributed to the UMass attack included senior Matt Wolcott, juniors Bryan Mazaferro, Brian Samela and Seth Kaplan, and sophomore Shaun Skeffington.

Wolcott primarily saw action at first base and was the A– 10 Player of the Week in late March. Mazzaferro started the season at shortstop, but moved over to third base when Kaplan came into the lineup. Samela shrugged off a sluggish start to hit over .300, while Skeffington was UMass' leadoff hitter, batting well over .300 and was nationally ranked in doubles per game.

The pitching staff was also solid for the Minutemen. Junior Bill Cooke emerged as the ace of the staff in the absence of senior captain Scott Barnsby. The southpaw went 8–1 during the regular season with seven complete games. Junior Ryan Cameron and senior Jeff Puleri also had nice campaigns on the hill, while Barnsby returned from early season tendinitis to pitch well late in the season. Sophomore Travis Veracka was steady both out of the bullpen and as a starter, while Rich Hartman, Nick Skirkanich, Craig Szado and Jason Grechika all saw time for the Minutemen this year.

And so, with only a handful of players graduating this year, and with five starters in the field coming back and three of the five starters on the mound also returning, the hopes remain high in Amherst for a sixth consecutive A–10 title next spring.

New era in place for UMass football

By Jonathan M. Place
Collegian Staff

After finishing the 1997 season 2–9 and seeing the Mike Hodges regime exit Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium for the last time, the Massachusetts football team is looking for improvement this fall.

Under the direction of the new head coach, Mark Whipple, who arrived at UMass via Brown University, the Minutemen would like to see a few things change. For starters, they would like to field a solid football team that can compete with any other team in the Atlantic 10 conference, something they couldn't do last season. Secondly, they'd like to see some fans in the seats at McGuirk Stadium, something that has been a problem for years.

Whipple, and the rest of his coaching staff, knows the only way to get fans back in the stands is to put points on the board. Earlier in the spring, when the team took to the field for its annual Spring Game, the teams tossed for a combined 513 yards. The game plan come this fall will call for an aerial attack which in turn should open up the field for a successful running game.

The yards on the ground should come from sophomore Marcel Shipp, who broke the rushing record for UMass rookies last season and led the team in all–purpose yards. With one year of experience under his belt and an offensive scheme which will give him more open field to run with, Shipp should improve his numbers considerably in the fall.

"The strength is our running backs," Whipple said. "Shipp has performed outstanding so far. If everyone is healthy, we should be good."

The quarterback position is still up for grabs. Senior Todd Bankhead looks to be the No. 1 starter for the team but junior Jeff Smith, who platooned at the position last season, will give Bankhead a run for his money. The competition between the two of them should produce the best man for the job come fall. Freshman Kelly Seibert will also be fighting for playing time at the quarterback spot.

The defense will be lead, once again, by senior co–captain linebacker Khari Samuel, who was second on the team in tackles last year in his first season at middle linebacker. Now, in his second term at that position, and with Matt Dawson and Kole Ayi flanking him on both sides, the Minutemen will have a strong linebacking core to help lead the defense during the fall.

No one is expecting this UMass team to turn things completely around. All Whipple and anyone wants is for this Maroon and White team to improve from the disastrous season of a year ago. But don't let anybody fool you. Whipple isn't going to just sit around and bide his time. He has brought in many recruits during the offseason to improve positions which struggled all of last year. During the summer, recruiting will continue. There still are holes on the team that have to be filled in order for the Minutemen to compete against such powerhouses as Delaware, Villanova, Connecticut and Maine.

Overall, holes still remain in the offensive and defensive line and in the defensive secondary, but the team has an entire summer to fill in the gaps and to get ready for the regular season.

Women's hoop emerges to reach NCAA tourney

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

At times it seemed they were still the little sister to Bruiser and his Division I big boys. Not to them, of course, but to those who were not even aware that Massachusetts has a Division I competitive women's basketball team.

After all, the Minutewomen had only been to the Big Dance once, a date that was over before 9 p.m. as they lost to Michigan State in the first round of the 1996 NCAA Tournament.

But missing out in 1997–98 with injuries and youth was not an option as they were seasoned veterans, ready for a stab at their second tournament bid. The season began with such promise, injuries were healing, and the young players were returning hungry for a second chance.

But that was all pre–Dec. 7, 1997, when sophomore pre– season All–Conference guard Kelly Van Huisen was sent to the bench for the season with a torn ACL. With the loss of their returning top scorer, the team sputtered, going 3–6 in December and January. Even in the wake of junior Tez Kraft's return, the team only floundered near the bottom of the conference.

But somehow coach Joanie O'Brien and her team made a miraculous turnabout. The carbonated play of sophomore forward Alison MacFarland and the fresh face influx of first–year player Kathy Coyner boosted the ailing squad. Junior center Yolanda Rayside also stepped it up to become one of the most improved players in the conference.

UMass went undefeated in February, winning nine of 10 games to become the A–10 Eastern Division champs for the first time in school history with a victory on the last day of the regular season.

O'Brien became the school's all–time winningest coach as she coasted past the century mark. Senior captain Sabriya Mitchell was named second team All–Conference and Kraft earned accolades as a third team All–Conference pick. Mitchell also became the school's all–time assist leader, finishing with 378.

But they didn't stop there.

UMass barreled its way through the A–10 tournament, losing in the final to Virginia Tech, 66–64. The meeting marked the first time the Minutewomen had ever made the A–10 finals. Kraft was named the tournament's Most Outstanding Player and senior captain Kara Tudman was honored with an All–Tournament team selection as well.

But after all was said and done, they had left one goal on the back porch.

The NCAA tournament.

The 1996 season was a perpetual reminder of what could be accomplished. But with the fall in the A–10 finals and subsequent loss for an automatic bid, the Minutewomen had to play the waiting game and hold on until the tournament selection show to see if they would continue their season.

It wasn't all for nought, as the Minutewomen were granted the No. 13 seed in the Mideast region of the NCAA tournament, facing off against the Big 10's best, the University of Iowa, who owned the Big 10 Player of the Year, Tangela Smith. Smith and Co. proved too much as UMass lost, 77–59, in a game much closer than the final score.

But much like their male counterparts, maybe O'Brien and her troops can make a habit of getting invited to the dance next year.

Women's lax completes turnaround

In the 1970s there was a television show called the "6– Million Dollar Man" in which a man was more or less technologically rebuilt from near–death to become an elite do–everything super hero.

In 1998 there was a similar occurrence in the University of Massachusetts athletic department. The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team has been rebuilt from death to become a national contender.

The UMass squad flatlined in 1991, nine years after going undefeated and winning the University's only national title. The freefalling program was deemed expendable by the athletic department after suffering through two losing seasons under coach Patti Bosso.

1994: Enter Francesca McClellan, the coach who took a sorry Yale team in 1986 and produced an NCAA powerhouse by 1990, peaking in '91 with a 12–3 record and a second consecutive ECAC championship.

Inheriting a group that wasn't victorious in a single game the previous season, McClellan went to work slowly, but surely, putting together a cohesive collection of recruits that would lead the once deceased program to prominence.

In 1998, the rebuilding process was completed. The Minutewomen followed up a respectable 6–8 mark with a 9– 5 record and an ECAC berth. It was the first time since 1988 that UMass took part in postseason play.

"We're very pleased with our season," McClellan said. "We evolved over the course of the season — we finished better than we started, and we had some tough losses. We're going to miss our seniors, but we're looking forward to taking the field again."

Nationally recognized teams such as Brown, Hofstra, and Harvard, which had previously dominated UMass could no longer handle the talented Massachusetts athletes, as the Minutewomen swept all three games against these schools.

UM softball heads back to NCAAs

When the 1998 season started for the Massachusetts softball team, the Minutewomen had only one goal in mind: a return the NCAA tournament.

After a successful run in 1997, UMass wanted to do the same in '98, but after a hard start, found themselves with many questions and few answers.

However, UMass bounced back in a big way, and after falling to 23–12 midway through the season, rallied to first win the Atlantic 10 Eastern Division title, then the A–10 tournament title, and finally, a pair of NCAA play–in games against Hofstra to reach the NCAA tournament.

The real fun started in early May with the A–10 tourney. After rolling by Virginia Tech, 8–0, and St. Joe's, 3–0, the Minutewomen downed the Hokies, 3–1, in the championship game to move on to the NCAA play–in game.

Junior pitcher Danielle Henderson was named the tourney's Most Outstanding Player for her performance, while Kelly Buckley, Nicole Faessler, Kim Gutridge and Tracey Osier were also All–Tournament team recipients.

Then, a few days later, UMass headed to Hempstead, N.Y. to face Hofstra in the play–in games. Once again, Henderson dominated, leading UMass to a pair of shutouts wins, 4–0 and 3–0.

"Taking two games from a team like this down here was a very, very tough feat for this team" UMass softball coach Elaine Sortino said following the play–in victories.
